Sound of the shofar a call for new year

"Happy is the people that know the sound of the shofar." — Psalms 89:16.

This pointed pronouncement is not merely a capsule prescription for Jewish contentment. It is, rather, a plea which carries within it the possibility of something deeper and more significant.

The shofar, an ancient instrument fashioned from nature, sounds a stormy, shivering, wailing, even tearful blast. But who among us is unfamiliar with its sound? From our youngest days we have all heard the shofar's call. Indeed, that is the central obligation of Rosh Hashanah: to hear the sound of the shofar.

Obviously the psalmist was aware of this as well. That is why he wrote of "knowing" the sound of the shofar as opposed to only hearing it. The happiness in his heart derived from understanding the inter-generational texture deeply rooted within the instrument, from knowing the very essence of its tremble.

The sound of the shofar, we are told, is intended to focus our thoughts both inward and heavenward to summon our conscience, to stimulate our spirit — in a sense, to rouse us from our slumber. For, though sleep nourishes, it also renders us oblivious to our true circumstance.

On the eve of the year 5755, the true circumstance of the Jewish people, is, as ever, fraught with worry, concern, mystery, wonder, challenge and hope. Our cowardly enemies strike again at the defenceless — whether in Afula or in Buenos Aires — killing countless persons. Xenophobic nationalism lurks menacingly around the corner in the alleyways and gutters of Eastern Europe. Rates of assimilation and intermarriage continue to climb in the Diaspora. And the cost of Jewish education is skyrocketing beyond the reach of middle class families and the federations.

And yet, so often this past year we seemed almost literally to be holding our breath or rubbing our eyes in disbelief at the nature and the pace of the peace process unfolding in the Middle East.

In Eastern Europe Jewish identity is slowly reappearing in spite of the inhospitable economic and social climate. Every major North American community has begun, in earnest, to seek solutions to its demographic fears. All across Canada, despite the cost, more children are enrolled in Jewish schools than ever before.

We approach the new year as our ancestors have in every generation, with optimism and hope, with the determination to overcome every travail, and thankful to the Almighty for the great, mysterious and wonderful gift to us called life.

For the Jewish people it has always been thus. And thus it will always be. The shofar bids us individually to awaken. Jewish history bids us individually to respond. To know this is to know the sound of the shofar.

L'Shanah tovah tikateivu v'techateimu.

Greetings from Israel's President Weizman

My Brothers and Sisters:

On Rosh Hashanah and in our daily prayers we say: 'Grant abundant peace unto Israel Thy people for ever; for Thou art Sovereign of all peace; and may it be good in Thy sight to bless Thy people Israel at all times and in every hour with Thy peace.'

Truly in the last year we have witnessed tremendous progress in our pursuit of peace. For thousands of years we prayed and hoped for a Jewish homeland in the land of Israel. We have succeeded in building a strong, independent and democratic country. Now we hope we shall be witnessing stability and peace, as more Arab countries accept Israel in our region.

A few days before last Rosh Hashanah, the signatures were appended to the Declaration of Principles with the Palestinians which aims at a solution of the historic conflict between the two peoples. In July, the Washington Declaration was signed with the Kingdom of Jordan, and a new page in Israel's relations with Jordan was opened.

The chances for a true peace are greater today than ever before, although during the last year we have continued to suffer from terrorism. The Jewish community in Argentina paid a heavy price, and other communities have been threatened as Jews and supporters of Israel. Our enemies will not succeed in derailing the peace process. They will not succeed in their effort to break our spirit and unity.

The past year has witnessed Israel's continued economic development and prosperity. Aliyah from the former Soviet Union and elsewhere has strengthened Israel not only as a reality in the Middle East, but as a reality in the pages of Jewish history.

The Jewish people and the Israelis can be proud of their achievements. Israel, with exports which amount to over $23 billion (US) annually and a GNP of $70 billion (US) is the leading economy in our region and is aiming to be on par with the developed countries. We can be proud of the Israeli high-tech industry and its achievements. Only a strong and vibrant economy can enable Israel to be a light to the nations and a source of pride, a magnet to the Jewish people.

We look ahead to the coming year with hope, and pray that this year will see the signature of peace treaties between Israel and all its Arab neighbors. We look to the future, hoping that more Jews will make aliyah and join us in the Land of Israel. In an era of peace, Israel can offer its people and the Jewish people as a whole a life of greater stability, spiritual enrichment and personal fulfilment.

We look to the future, hoping and striving for stronger relations between Israel and the Jewish communities in the world, for the fulfilment of the words of the prayer: "Sound the great horn for our freedom; lift up the ensign to gather our exiles and gather us together from the four corners of the earth."

Shanah tovah u'gemar chatimah tovah.

Jewish Community Centre files proposal to creditors

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The cash-strapped Jewish Community Centre (JCC), teetering on the verge of bankruptcy, filed proposals to its creditors under the Bankruptcy Act last week in a bid to get the Centre's financial house in order.

It also closed the Leah Posluns Theatre and cancelled the upcoming season.

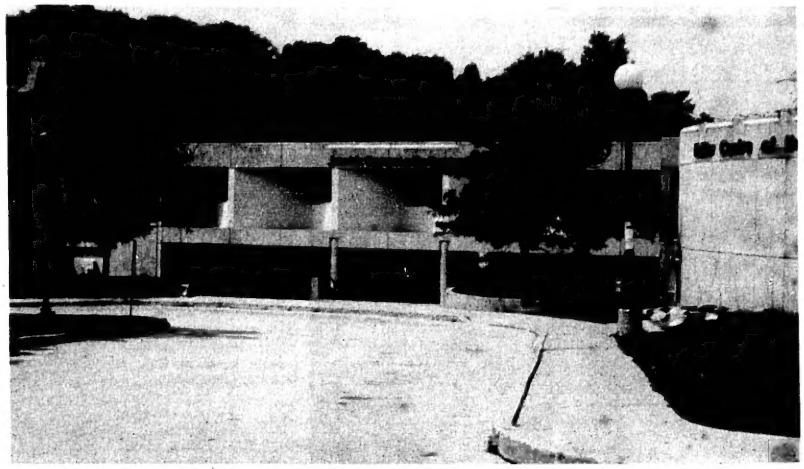
Thirty-two employees of the theatre and of the JCC's central administration were let go in the cost-saving move, said Sharon Bacal, a member of the JCC's recently-appointed three-person board of directors.

The closing of the theatre, which is part of the JCC, was necessary to ensure the financial viability of the Centre, she told The CJN. The theatre was a money-losing venture that ran an annual shortfall of up to $340,000, added Helen Finder-Guttman, a second member of the JCC's board.

Theatre staff were bitter in the wake of the closing. "I don't think we've been rescued," said someone close to the theatre who declined to be identified.

Staff at the theatre are "angry. Some of them have been there 18 years, 16 years. Their lives are tied into the place. It's not a job, it's a way of life," the source stated.

The theatre's 4,500 subscribers will receive refunds for the upcoming season, the source added.



The Jewish Community Centre has fallen on hard times. [Alron photo]

In addition to the staff at the theatre, JCC executive director Paul Brownstein was let go, as was the "central administration staff," Finder-Guttman said. Because the JCC will be splitting into three separate entities — the Bathurst, Downtown Bloor and Northeast Valley facilities — there was no need for a central administrative structure that included accounting and purchasing staff, she said.

The JCC will also close the Institute for Jewish Learning, the Leah Posluns Theatre's drama school and the dance and music programs that come under the auspices of the Koffler Gallery.

Referring to the dance and music programs, Finder-Guttman said "it is our intention to offer these programs this fall. . . under a different structure or arrangement that is fiscally responsible."

All of that depends, however, on whether the JCC's 290 creditors accept the Centre's financial proposals. "We filed a notice of intention to submit proposals to creditors under part three of the Bankruptcy Act," Bacal said. "We now have 30 days to submit the proposal. The creditors then have 21 days to either accept or reject. If the creditors reject, we are automatically bankrupt. That's very serious. We are very hopeful that they will accept the proposal."

Bacal said that many of the 290 creditors are suppliers from within the Jewish community. The tradesmen are owed approximately $1.2 million, said Morris Zbar, a spokesperson for the Federation.

The Bank of Montreal is the largest single creditor. It is owed about $10 million. Honeywell has a claim of about $1 million in the form of a construction lien on an energy-saving project, and there are also deferred revenues (for courses and programs that people have signed up for) totalling about $1 million. Revenue Canada is owed about $520,000 in unremitted employee income tax deductions, Zbar said.

That puts the JCC's total debt at between $14 million and $15 million.

Bacal said that acceptance of the proposal by the creditors need not be unanimous. "I think it will come down to whether the bank accepts the deal. I'm feeling very hopeful. It's a fair proposal. We are giving absolutely everything we have to the creditors."

Under terms of the rescue plan proposed by the Federation and the JCC, the Federation will pay the bank $4.5 million immediately. The Bloor and Northeast Valley branches will become independent but will be responsible for raising $3 million and $1 million respectively towards payment of the bank debt. The Federation will provide $750,000 over three years to aid in Bloor's fundraising effort.

Employees who have been terminated will be offered severance packages, Bacal said. Funds for the severance packages and to pay off unsecured creditors will come from a number of sources. The JCC has approximately $700,000 left from the $1.8 million it received from the Federation's Endowment Fund. It will have $500,000 in operating capital from the Federation should the proposals be accepted and a restructuring completed.

In addition, interest payments on Israel Bonds owned by the JCC will be offered to creditors and the JCC is still hoping to collect on pledges it received when it embarked on an ambitious renovation program in the late 1980s, Bacal said. It was that renovation that prompted the JCC to borrow from the Bank of Montreal when the economy turned sour and the pledges remained uncollected.

Meanwhile, Federation president Bernie Ghert has sent a personal letter to 25 community members asking them to guarantee $100,000 toward a new $2.5 million line of credit for future operations of the Bathurst facility. Any funds borrowed on the line of credit, together with the $5 million borrowed by the Federation to help pay the bank ($4.5 million) and provide the JCC with $500,000 in operating capital, will be repaid through a future campaign.

Ghert described the line of credit as an "absolutely critical element to assure the community of JCC facilities, services and programs that benefit seniors, youth and new immigrants.

"We feel for those who are now out of work. But the jobs of 276 [JCC] employees have been saved and without this restructuring their futures would have been jeopardized. Now a combination of the credit line and the steps that have been taken clear the way toward a hopeful future," Ghert said in his letter.

Zionist dream of peace became reality in 5754

Greetings from Israel's consul general in Toronto.

As we celebrate the New Year 5755, we have witnessed the fulfilment of the Zionist dream — the achievement of peace.

From the beginning, an integral part of the Zionist dream has been to live as a Jewish, Zionist and democratic state in harmony with our Arab neighbors. The meetings between Golda Meir and King Abdullah of Jordan, the signing of the Camp David Accord by Menachem Begin and Anwar al-Sadat, the signing of the Document of Principles by the PLO and Israel, and the signing of the Washington Declaration by Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin and King Hussein of Jordan were all a natural evolution of Israel's quest for peace.

There have been many obstacles in our struggle for peace. The Islamic fundamentalist terror organization, Hezbollah, has been a threat not only to the achievement of peace in the Middle East, but to the free world.

The government of Israel has declared war on terror. Israel is making a major military and intelligence effort to defend Jewish institutions around the world and to stamp out terror. This goal can only be fulfilled if the governments of Western countries are prepared to cooperate and not ignore terrorist activities in their own countries.

At this critical time, we need the solidarity and support of the Jewish communities around the world.

Dror Zeigerman

The memorial service for the fallen in Argentina reflects the solidarity of the Jewish community in Toronto with other Jewish communities and is an example of how the Jewish community can impress upon the Canadian government the need to participate in the global war against terror.

The State of Israel is ready to take risks for peace because morality and peace are part of Jewish tradition and culture. Peace will bring stability to Israel and will also affect the rest of the world for generations to come. We can be proud of this contribution.

The fate of Jewish communities in the Diaspora is inextricably linked with the State of Israel, both the struggles and the achievements. The support of world Jewry has always been a source of strength in Israel's struggle for survival.

Now, as we embark on this new era of peace and stability in the Middle East, we must influence the younger generation to make aliyah and be actively involved in these exciting times.

May the year 5755 be a year filled with true peace for Israel and the entire world.

Shanah tovah u'gemar chatimah tovah.

Coming year should finally see a lasting peace for all

Greetings from Israel's ambassador to Canada.

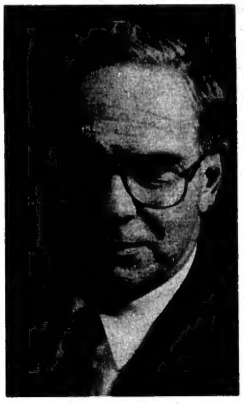
To the Jewish Community of Canada

On the eve of the year which is now drawing to a close, the prime minister of Israel addressed the Palestinian people from the lawn of the White House. In powerful and emotional words, he urged them to put an end to enmity and to bloodshed.

He returned to Washington. And again, on the eve of the coming New Year, from the same lawn and from the Legislative Chamber of Congress, Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin spoke to King Hussein of Jordan, to the people of the United States, to my countrymen, and to the Jewish people throughout the world.

He spoke words that have filled the dreams of every prime minister of Israel and stirred the hearts of our people these past 16 years:

"We have gone a long way towards a full treaty of peace, and even though our work has not yet ended, it is my hope and belief that not long from today we shall return to sign a final and a permanent treaty of peace."



Itzhak Shelef

Such is the hope and the belief of the entire Jewish household, in the Diaspora and in Israel. Together, over the years, we have walked the long road. And together, we shall continue to the very last mile.

On behalf of the people and the government of Israel, and on behalf of my family, it is my pleasure to extend to you and your families, our best wishes for health, blessing, and prosperity.

May we all be privileged in the year 5755 to arrive at the end of our journey: true, lasting peace for Israel, its neighbors, indeed, for the entire world.

L'shanah tovah tikateivu v'techateimu.

Community finishes the year stronger despite challenges

Greetings from the president of Canadian Jewish Congress.

As we look towards the New Year 5755, though faced with many challenges, Canada's Jewish community is stronger than ever.

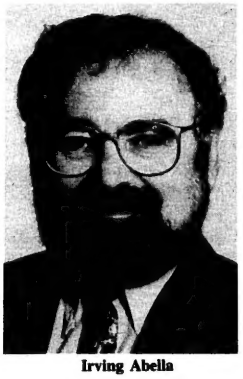
Our agenda, however, is a weighty one. We continue to combat racism and anti-Semitism, urge the government to prosecute Nazi war criminals still residing in this country, and work tirelessly on the issue of Jewish continuity.

On the international front, the Jewish community continues to work for a just peace in the Middle East while at the same time it is appalled at continuing acts of terror against Jews in Isreal, Argentina, England and elsewhere by those opposed to the peace process.

In the past year we have witnessed the historic handshake on the White House lawn between Israel Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin and PLO leader Yasser Arafat, and more recently the agreement between Prime Minister Rabin and King Hussein of Jordan, formally ending the state of war between the two countries.

The irony of Jewish life in Canada today is that despite our success, our achievements and our status, concern about our future obsesses us all.

Our concern is of course for our children. Will they remain Jewish? Will our community survive into the next century as strongly as it seems to be leaving this one? Are the very seeds of our destruction implanted in our success? Can Jewishness survive in an open multicultural tolerant society?



Irving Abella

In North America Jews are confronted by the classic paradox of a pluralistic society. We desperately want to fully integrate into a society where until relatively recently we were not allowed, yet we know that by doing so we may not be able to maintain ourselves as a unique, vibrant, identifiable community.

Paradoxically, throughout our history, Jews have in some ways feared a truly open society as much as we have valiantly fought for it. Today, we Jews in North America worry more about assimilation than about anti-Semitism. Absorption not anti-Semitism seems to be our greatest threat in North America.

It seems to be self-evident what the major challenge to our Jewish leadership over the next generation should be. We must try to build a Jewish community that is not simply concerned with survival, but one that is creative and attractive to our children — a community with substance and content, a community that stresses not only memory and remembrance, but other important values of our tradition — social justice, equity and compassion.

We will need a Jewish community in Canada whose members will take pride in its activities and achievements. We will have to find ways to convert alienation to action and passivity to pride, the pride of being possessors of a great legacy, a legacy which has meaning for today and beyond.

In North America, living as a Jew is only one option amongst many. We must reassure ourselves that, even without a crisis in Israel or an upsurge of anti-Semitism, there is sufficient depth and internal commitment in our community for its cultural and social survival.

The agenda is daunting. The task is formidable. But we are a formidable people.

Helping the blind on holidays

NEW YORK — Before the High Holy Days this year, as it has done since its inception 63 years ago, the Jewish Braille Institute (JBI) of America will distribute braille prayer books for Rosh Hashanah and Yom Kippur in three versions — Conservative, Orthodox and Reform — without charge to the blind and visually impaired.

Also available for distribution is a special Yizkor booklet in large print for the visually impaired, containing memorial prayers for the departed.

"Through the free distribution of these prayer books in braille and in large print, blind men, women and children — and those with significant visual dificulties — may fully observe Jewish holidays and rituals," said Gerald M. Kass, JBI's executive vice president.

Activities of CSIS informant raises questions

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — What did the Canadian Security and Intelligence Service (CSIS) know and when did they know it?

Those are two of the questions Canadian Jewish organizations, together with a lot of other Canadians, would like answered about Canada's spy agency.

In a week of revelations about CSIS, news reports indicated that Grant Bristow, a CSIS informant working for the racist Heritage Front, passed the names of prominent members of the Jewish community to Tom Metzger, a U.S. racist with a history of violence.

Meanwhile, the Vancouver Sun quoted Tony McAleer, who operates Canadian Liberty Net, an extremist telephone hotline, as saying that in 1992 Bristow passed him personal information about a local Congress official, Michael Elterman. At the time, Elterman was chairman of Canadian Jewish Congress, Pacific region.

While some analysts suggest that this may be an attempt by white supremacists to tarnish Bristow, the reports have concerned Jewish groups.

In a civil case in Oregon, Metzger was held responsible for the beating death of a visiting Ethiopian student by white supremacists.

A CBC story last week indicated that Bristow passed information about the leadership of Canadian Jewish Congress and B'nai Brith Canada to Metzger.

"I feel threatened," said Irving Abella, president of Congress. "The job of CSIS is to protect Canadians, not put them in danger. If the story is accurate, then it endangers the lives of Canadians.

"This is not a ragamuffin group. It's a hard core group that's committed to violence and is under surveillance by the FBI," he said.

B'nai Brith condemned CSIS's "alleged activities [that] may have jeopardized the safety of innocent Canadians.

"Allegations of spying on Canadian Jews, among other minorities, have seriously damaged the credibility of Canada's intelligence community," said Frank Dimant, executive vice-president of B'nai Brith.

"CSIS appears to have overstepped its mandate and to have lost control of its own operations. . . The idea of an individual on the payroll of a government agency intentionally endangering the welfare of Canadian citizens is unconscionable. If CSIS allowed their own informant to hand over personal information about Jewish leaders, then it is clear that something has gone seriously wrong at CSIS," he said.

Bristow's alleged activities vis-a-vis the Jewish community go back about one and a half years. At that time, a man who identified himself as a reporter for the Ottawa Citizen walked into the Toronto offices of Network Canada, a Jewish student organization, and asked to see the group's files on hate groups.

He claimed he was helping research a new book on Canadian racists and would appreciate the help the files could provide, recalled Howard Katz, executive director of Network. The "reporter" also asked whether the student group could help him get access to Congress files on the subject.

The student got in touch with Bernie Farber, director of community relations for Congress, who did a little research of his own. His calls showed that the Citizen had no such reporter and that the author of the book was not employing researchers.

Later, the Network student was in the Congress offices and by chance saw a photo of members of the white supremacist Heritage Front. The student immediately recognized the "reporter" as Grant Bristow, chief of security for the Heritage Front, Katz said.

At the time, the event was reported to the police but no more was made of it, Farber said. It was not unexpected that the racist group would try to learn what Jewish organizations knew about it, he said.

But an investigative piece by Toronto Sun reporter Bill Dunphy, which identified Bristow as a CSIS informant, added a new dimension to the events of a year-and-a-half ago.

Last week, Congress added its voice to the chorus calling for an investigation of CSIS.

Both a parliamentary subcommittee on security and the Security Intelligence Review Committee (SIRC), CSIS's civilian watchdog, will investigate the spy agency's activities.

Each day last week brought new information about alleged CSIS activities, including Bristow's role in providing security for Reform leader Preston Manning, and in gathering information on a CBC documentary on racism among Canadian troops serving as peacekeepers in Somalia. The Toronto Sun and the Toronto Star were asked by the RCMP to turn over documents pertaining to CSIS stories they had run; both have refused to comply without a court order.

Among the questions raised by the revelations:

- Did CSIS, through Bristow, attempt to discredit the Reform Party by getting Heritage Front members to join the party?
- Did CSIS spy on the CBC or provide intelligence about a CBC documentary to a cabinet minister?
- Did CSIS go beyond infiltrating the Heritage Front to actually playing a pivotal role, through its informant, in setting up and funding the racist group?
- Did Bristow attempt to gather information about Congress and B'nai Brith, in addition to Network? And if so, for whom did he gather this information?
- Did Bristow pass information about Jewish community leaders to Metzger?

Although Solicitor General Herb Gray had instructed SIRC to investigate all aspects of the CSIS controversy, Ron Wood, Manning's press secretary, urged a parliamentary review as well.

A parliamentary review would be "more legitimate in the public's eye," he said.

"Did Bristow have the blessing of someone higher up to work his way into the inner circle of [the Reform Party]," Wood asked. "Why would a CSIS plant encourage hate group members to join a legitimate party?"

"He may have acted as a rogue, or on the other hand, there may have been someone higher up saying this is a good thing to do," he told The CJN.

Wood suggested the possibility that the media may have been "sucked into this smear of the Reform Party."

Derek Lee, chair of the six-member parliamentary review subcommittee, said the subcommittee will examine two questions: has CSIS operated within its mandate in a reasonably efficacious way? and have the rights and liberties of Canadians been protected during CSIS operations?

Lee said "from what I've seen, there is no evidence that CSIS was targetting the CBC or Reform. But it's clear that an alleged informant for CSIS had contacts with the Reform Party."

"At the moment, I haven't heard a credible indictment of CSIS," he added.

Mazon expands across Canada

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Mazon Canada continues to expand its presence in Jewish communities across the country.

With Rosh Hashanah fast approaching, Mazon, which bills itself as "a Jewish response to hunger," has distributed pledge cards to 67 congregations from coast to coast. Last year, only 37 congregations participated in the Mazon fundraising effort.

The pledge cards ask those observing the High Holy Days to "fulfil this New Year's mitzvah" and "help make this season of renewal one of sharing with those who have no bread."

Most congregations include the pledge cards in their congregational bulletin or High Holy Day ticket mailing, said Marilyn Aarons-Guttman, executive director of Mazon. Other congregations place the cards on pews in the sanctuary or leave them at an information table for members to pick up.

"Our pledge card campaign is our most important and successful campaign," Aarons-Guttman said. "In addition to raising money to feed the hungry, it enables Mazon to reach thousands of Jewish families across Canada through their congregations, many of whom would not know about us without their congregation's support."

The pledge cards were sent to 24 houses of worship in the Toronto area, 13 in Montreal and its suburbs, and to congregations in Halifax, Moncton, Ottawa, Hamilton, Newmarket, London, Windsor, Oakville, Kitchener, Kingston, Brampton, Winnipeg, Saskatoon, Regina, Calgary, Edmonton and Vancouver.

Mazon allocates funds to grassroots organizations, both Jewish and non-Jewish, which work to alleviate the problem of hunger. To date it has distributed more than $500,000 in Canada and it recently allocated $5,000, it's largest ever disbursement, to help alleviate the suffering of the people of Rwanda.

For more information, contact Mazon's head office at 788 Marlee Ave., Suite 206, Toronto, Ont., M6B 3K1 or telephone (416) 783-7554.

רעד שפּר – אַ ראש השנה סימבאָל

פון דר. פּרענד וויינבערג

עס איז פאַראַן אַ שוואַרצער שופר, וואָס מען באָנוצט ביי דער צעוועמאָניע פון ליגן אין ערנסט-יזדיקן מענטש אין תּוֹם.

אַן עצה טובה פון רמב"ם, וואָס איז גוט פאַר אונדז אָלע צו פאַלגן. און לאָמיר אָלע תּאָבן אַ שנה טובה ומתוקה!

Johnson wants Quebec's youth to remain in the province

By JANICE ARNOLD
CJN Staff Reporter

MONTREAL —Young people should not be forced to leave Quebec because they have no economic opportunity here, but should have the choice of working in the province or elsewhere, Premier Daniel Johnson recently told a gathering of Jewish community representatives and D'Arcy McGee Liberals.

Speaking at Israel Poale Zedek Congregation, Johnson said there is nothing wrong with a young person taking a job away from home because the experience can be "mind-expanding.

"The important thing is that they have the choice and that will depend on our ability to create jobs," he said.

Johnson mentioned his own son, who after graduating from McGill University, took a job in Vancouver. "While we missed him greatly, we had the full knowledge that he would come back," but English-speaking families, he acknowledged, often do not have that comfort.

His main message was that he is seeing throughout Quebec a return to the Liberals that he has not seen since the 1980 referendum and that he thinks that's because people like the party's economic plans.

Most of the gathering was devoted to questions and comments from the audience of about 75.

Johnson was accompanied by local Liberal candidate Lawrence Bergman, the president of the shul; as well as Notre-Dame-de-Grace hopeful Russell Copeman and Industry Minister Gerald Tremblay who is running again in Outremont.

Eric Maldoff, former president of Alliance Quebec, told Johnson that the difficulty anglophones have in getting jobs in the Quebec civil service has been "devastating" to young people, giving them the feeling that they do not belong in the province and narrowing their employment options.

"I think if you look at the total public sector, including schools and hospitals, it is a fair mirror image [of the population]. But the public service is another cup of tea," Johnson admitted.

However, a number of factors are working against increasing anglophones in the civil service, including the fact only about 30 per cent of the jobs are in Montreal and that staff is being cut back by 14 per cent, he said.

"The target of 12 per cent [anglophones and ethnics] is extremely difficult to reach," he said.

Johnson was noncommittal in his response to Rabbi Moishe Glustein, principal of Yeshiva Gedola Mercaz Hatorah, who expressed the hope that a Liberal government would be open to discussion of extending access to English schools to immigrants.

Johnson was also vague on a request from Raphael Assor of Federation CJA that the goverment, through the Health Ministry or the Montreal Regie Regionale of health services, join with the Jewish community in a study it is conducting on how to better serve its elderly. Assor suggested that because the Jewish community has a much higher than average proportion of elderly, the way its services are organized might be used as a model for the rest of Quebec.

Russell Copeman

Senator Leo Kolber said he felt the Liberals were not placing enough emphasis on the word "separation" rather than "sovereignty," [in references to the Party Quebecois (PQ) platform.]

Lily Frank, executive vice-president of Canadian Hadassah-WIZO, concurred, saying she felt many Quebecers think sovereignty means remaining part of Canada.

Johnson replied that the party is using "separation" as much as possible, as well as such "graphic" French words as rupture and brisure (breakup).

In introducing Johnson, Bergman said "this community can meet its goals as part of the Daniel Johnson team better than outside of it. We need a strong voice within government." He said political stability and economic growth are the overriding issues of the campaign.

He pledged to work personally for the betterment of youth and the elderly through a partnership between community and government.

Before arriving at the synagogue in Hampstead, Bergman and Johnson made quick handshaking tours in the Cavendish Mall and Cote St. Luc Shopping Centre.

The two had come from a rally for Liberals in the 13 west Montreal ridings at Concordia University's Loyola campus. There, several members of the Jewish community were brought onto the stage as prominent area supporters of the Liberals. Among them were: Joe Rabinovitch, executive director of the Association of Jewish Day Schools; Aline Malka and Michelle Cohen, active in the Federation CJA Women's Federation; Sheldon Hershon, of the Adath Israel Synagogue executive; lawyer Caspar Bloom; Maldoff, who is president of the Montreal Children's Hospital; and Joel Hartt, chair of the Lakeshore School Board.

"Don't worry," said Johnson as he took the stage, to the wildly cheering 500-strong party faithful. He declared that the Liberals believe in "a Quebec for all Quebecers, where everyone feels comfortable and all languages are spoken...[and in] building a united society where we respect our neighbors."

He portrayed federalism as an economic union that benefits Quebec and ensures its continued development. He pledged to cut unemployment by five per cent and increase exports.

International Affairs and Immigration Minister John Ciaccia, who warmed up the crowd before Johnson spoke, said that if the PQ wins and submits a "solemn declaration" to proceed toward independence, the rest of Canada is not likely to take a "business as usual" attitude in its relations with Quebec. The rest of Canada is Quebec's biggest trading partner and that will be put at risk by a PQ victory, as will the province's international economic ties, he suggested.

Toronto couple helps fund new skating rink in Metulla

By PAUL LUNGEN

TORONTO — If, some day in the not too distant future, an Israeli mounts the podium at an international figure skating competition to accept a medal, part of the credit will have to go to William and Dorothy Drevnig of Toronto.

Neither does much skating anymore, but thanks to them, young skaters in Israel will have the chance — and the place — to practise their skills and prepare themselves for international meets.

Earlier this summer, the Drevnigs presented the United Israel Appeal (UIA) with a cheque for $1 million to go towards construction of an Olympic-sized skating rink at the Canada Centre in Metulla.

The rest of the funding for the project, which will cost between $3 and $4 million (US), will come from the Israeli government and the Metulla town council.

The Drevnigs' contribution is a continuation of the Canadian Jewish community's support for a multi-use recreational complex that has proven to be a smash hit and a tourist mecca in the northern Israeli community.

An estimated 500,000 visitors per year stream to Metulla on the Lebanese border to enjoy Canada Centre's skating rink, indoor and outdoor pools, basketball court, gymnasium facilities, shooting range and other amenities.

The centre is already renowned in Israel and the expansion/addition envisioned by planners is designed to keep Metulla at the centre of tourists' travel plans and improve the quality of life in Israel's north.

The current rink at about one-quarter to one-third Olympic size is in constant demand and not large enough for the needs of elite-level athletes or the numerous kids who are just learning to skate or play hockey.

The new rink will permit ex-Soviet oleh Misha Shmerkin, a world-class figure skater, to practise in Metulla; it will also serve as a venue for young Israeli athletes to sharpen their skills, said Gerald Halbert, chair of UIA.

The new facility is scheduled to open no later than the fall of 1995 and perhaps as early as next spring, he said.

Drevnig, who used to skate in his youth, said he chose to support Canada Centre because he was looking for a worthwhile project in Israel that "had a Canadian angle."

He said his lawyer, Donald Carr, directed him to the Metulla project.

"Ice skating is very popular in Canada and. . . we thought that as Canadians" we'd support a Canadian-style project, he said.

The new facility will be known as the William and Dorothy Drevnig Building.

William Drevnig is the former founder and owner of the Pennington's clothing chain, which he sold about 10 years ago.

Halbert said expansion of the centre will enhance the benefits provided by the original Canada Centre.

"The major significance is what it's done for the morale of the people in the north" who have had to suffer from rocket attacks and constant tension emanating from Lebanon, he said.

Canada Centre has generated a substantial tourism industry in Israel's north and "it's brought Russians to the area and given them employment," he said.

UTJ synagogue gets its first rabbi

Set to start on Rosh Hashanah

By MAURICE LUCOW
CJN Western Correspondent

VANCOUVER — Shaarey Tefilah congregation will start its third year of operation at Rosh Hashanah with its own rabbi — its first one.

Rabbi Mordechai Scher has been appointed and will conduct the High Holiday services, says the congregation's chair, Dr. Arthur Hayes. Rabbi Ronald Price, executive vice-president of the Union for Traditional Judaism (UTJ) will also participate in the services. Rabbi Itsak Birnbaum will be Torah reader. The congregation is affiliated with the New Jersey-based UTJ.

Shaarey Tefilah is the first Vancouver congregation founded under the aegis of UTJ "and our dreams to have our own rabbi have become a reality," Hayes proudly told The CJN. Up to now, Rabbi Price has provided advice and assistance in setting up the congregation and has often been here to conduct services. Most recently he spent the entire Passsover week here.

The congregation does not yet have a permanent home and has been holding Shabbat and Sunday services at the Ramada Centre, on West Broadway. The High Holiday services will be held in the new Talmud Torah auditorium. Daily weekly Schacharit services are held in private homes.

"Despite the fact we haven't had a rabbi or permanent home, our membership has been increasing," Hayes said. About 70 families have joined so far.

"Our search for our own home is well under way and we hope to have one by the end of the year," Hayes added.

In keeping with UTJ policy, the congregation makes a special effort to sign up members who have had no previous synagogue affiliation. "We're not trying to take members from any other shul. We especially want to encourage younger unaffiliated Jewish families so they won't be lost to Judaism," Hayes said.

He said the "name of the game" of the UTJ is outreach to those who want to live a Jewish lifestyle and "this is the task we have set for ourselves."

Hayes said services are conducted in accordance with halachah, and are not egalitarian.

"We believe," says the UTJ in an information booklet "that Jewish tradition views men and women as equals but that women's role should be complementary, not interchangeable. But we allow considerable latitude for women's participation in our ritual. Our Panel of Halachic Inquiry was the first authoritative body to issue a thorough responsum, permitting the creation of women's prayer groups."

At Shaarey Tefilah women sit separately behind a mechitzah. However men and women can sit together behind the mechitzah but Hayes says this rarely happens.

UTJ says it is akin to Orthodoxy because it adheres to halachah but it considers Orthodoxy too rigid and exclusive. "In that respect, we prefer the openness of Conservatism, though this movement is too liberal."

Rabbi Price, the executive vice-president, says "we believe there is an observant traditional Judaism without it being watered down."

UTJ, started in 1985, offers a number of Judaic services which are available to individuals. "Congregation affiliation with the UTJ is possible but is not required to subscribe to our services," says the information booklet. "Any synagogue or individual may benefit from our programs."

UTJ has recently gone "on line" by computer to provide its services on the information highway.

Individual membership in UTJ in Canada is $36 (Canadian); $50 for the family. The Canadian office is at 55 Yeomans Rd., Downsview, Ont., M3H 3J7.

Information about the movement can be obtained by calling head office in New Jersey, 1-800-843-8825.

The News in Brief

JDC Distributes Shofarot Kits

NEW YORK — As part of the High Holiday activities planned by the American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee, 350 shofarot kits were distributed to Jewish schools and synagogues across the former Soviet Union in time for the new year.

Included in the kits are a shofar, shofar cover and a booklet prepared by the JDC on the background and symbolism of the shofar.

Every schoolchild will also receive three colorful explanatory booklets on Rosh Hashanah, Yom Kippur and Sukkot, in Russian. As well, lulavim, etrogim and sukkot will be distributed to synagogues and educational institutions through the former Soviet republics.

Prince Philip to Visit

JERUSALEM — Britain's Prince Philip is to pay a short visit to Israel at the invitation of Yad Vashem. He will be received by President Ezer Weizman and Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin.

The Duke of Edinburgh will arrive here before the end of the year, the Foreign Ministry has confirmed, but it is not yet clear whether the visit will take place on the proposed date of Oct. 30.

Yad Vashem invited the prince to receive the Righteous Among the Nations award in the name of his mother, the late Princess Alice of Greece, who saved a Jewish family during World War II.

Princess Alice gave instructions to hide members of the Cohen family in a room in the palace in Athens, according to Dr. Mordechai Paldiel of Yad Vashem. The Cohens had been friendly with the Greek monarchs before the Nazi occupation and some of them escaped to Egypt where they joined the Greek forces.

NEW YORK — Elias Canetti, whose works attacking fascism won the 1981 Nobel Prize for literature, died August 13 in Zurich. He was 89.

Canetti, a Sephardi Jew, was born in Bulgaria to a wealthy family and raised in Manchester, Frankfurt, Vienna and Zurich. He was buried in Zurich next to Irish writer James Joyce, who died there in 1941.

Canetti's first novel, Auto-da-Fe, was seen as an attack on fascism and banned in Germany in the early 1930s. He fled Austria after the 1938 Nazi takeover and began his major work, Crowds and Power, published in 1960, to explain mass psychology and the pull of dictators.

IDF Wages Called Too High

JERUSALEM — Wages in the Israel Defence Force (IDF) are too high, Finance Minister Avraham Shohat told The Jerusalem Post last month.

Shohat said "a large chunk of the [defence] budget goes to salaries and improved conditions. I think [wages in the Army] are too high and need to be adjusted to the rest of the economy."

The Army has countered Treasury allegations that high salaries are the reason the defence budget will not be increased.

"The people in the Treasury are saying that a career Army officer should be ashamed to earn a decent living and serve just for ideological reasons. This is manipulative propaganda which is also an inaccurate representation of facts," a senior Army officer said.

Salaries for military staff and non-combat officers ranging from captain to colonel are either comparable to or less than an equivalent position in the civilian sector, the officer emphasized.

Controversial writer dies

JERUSALEM — Israeli philosopher and intellectual gadfly Yeshayahu Leibowitz died in his sleep August 18 in Jerusalem at 91.

Leibowitz, who once compared Israeli administration of the territories to Nazi rule in Europe, was awarded the prestigious Israel Prize last year, which he later turned down after wide-spread protest.

Born in Latvia, Leibowitz studied medicine, chemistry, philosophy and Halachah before making aliyah in 1932. He became a chemistry professor at the Hebrew University of Jerusalem and his classes, which covered the breadth of the natural sciences and the humanities, drew large crowds. An Orthodox Jew, he also lectured and wrote extensively on Maimonides.

Leibowitz was a vocal critic of both Labor and Likud governments for years. He fired salvos against Shas party spiritual leader Rabbi Eliezer Schach and the late Rabbi Menachem Mendel Schneerson for mixing politics with religion, and argued for the separation of religion and state with former prime minister David Ben-Gurion.

Peace from the pulpit

NEW YORK — North American rabbis are being urged to support the Mideast peace process during the upcoming High Holiday services.

A 50-page guide compiled by the Israel Policy Forum, a New York-based liberal advocacy group, has been mailed to 4,000 rabbi of all denominations. The guide includes fact sheets on the peace process, quotes from traditional sources, and a letter of support from Israeli Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin. Rabin asks the rabbis "to educate our fellow Jews to act in accordance with Jewish values ... by teaching peace."

The package was mailed one week after the Reform movement made a similar appeal to its 860 rabbis in North America.

Germany Denies Zhirinovsky Visa

BONN — The German embassy in Moscow has refused a visa request by Russian ultranationalist Vladimir Zhirinovsky to visit Germany this month.

Foreign Minister Klaus Kinkel ordered the ban on the grounds that the visit might work against "Germany's democratic foundations."

Zhirinovsky, who leads Russia's Liberal Democratic Party, was invited by the neo-Nazi Volks Union Party for a lecture tour throughout the country at the end of September.

In December 1993, Germany denied Zhirinovsky and seven of his associates permission to enter the country, saying Zhirinovsky's presence would "prejudice German state interests."

Late last year, Zhirinovsky made waves by entering Austria and staying at an Alpine resort with a friend who was a member of the Nazi SS. He entered Austria by passing through Munich, where he met with Gerhard Frey, leader of the extreme right-wing German People's Union.

Author Ernst Pawel Dies

NEW YORK — Ernst Pawel, who wrote about giant Jewish figures of history, died late last month of cancer at his home in the New York suburb of Great Neck. He was 74.

Included among his works the 1984 biography of Czech Jewish writer Franz Kafka, The Nightmare of Reason, which won several prizes and was translated into 10 languages.

Pawel also wrote The Labyrinth of Exile, a biography of Zionist pioneer Theodor Herzl.

He recently completed a book about German Jewish poet Heinrich Heine, and at the time of his death was working on his memoirs, titled Life In The Dark Ages.

He also wrote three novels, The Island of Time, The Dark Tower and In the Absence of Magic, as well as essays and book reviews.

Survivor Returns as Envoy

BUDAPEST — Israel's new ambassador to Hungary, Joel Alon, is returning here after leaving Hungary in 1949 with his family, all of whom survived the Holocaust.

"It's a great satisfaction that after 45 years I can return to Hungary as ambassador representing Israel," Alon said in a telephone interview.

During the Holocaust, Alon, a twin, was a victim of the infamous experiments performed on twins by Auschwitz doctor Josef Mengele.

Alon, his twin brother and his parents survived the Holocaust and went to Israel.

Alon is replacing departing envoy, David Kraus.

But Will it Have Holes?

GENEVA — For generations, the Swiss lived without knowing the joys of the bagel. Now, all that has changed thanks to the efforts of Morris Abram, the former U.S. ambassador to Geneva.

Abram, who has stayed on in Geneva as representative of the UN, is producing a kosher bagel, hoping it will be a hit, at least with the 6,000-member Jewish community.

The kosher bagel, dubbed by the Tribune de Geneve as "Morris' bagel," is prepared under the supervision of Rabbi David Messas of Geneva.

The unforeseen results of last year's Oslo start

By YESHAYAHU ANUG

The handshakes in Oslo and Washington are now a year behind us and a lot has happened since. Though initial progress has been made in Gaza and in Jericho and is continuing slowly in the West Bank as well, the implementation of the celebrated agreement between Israel and the PLO is difficult and much behind the intended schedule.

By now it is evident that the psychological impact of the ceremonies and of the declared change of policies has not altered the state of mutual distrust and that only time and progress could gradually modify the mood on both sides. Rhetoric, often bad and insensitive on both sides, as well as sporadic acts of violence less frequent than before, is clouding the forecast.

All this could have been predicted. There cannot be a smooth ride to full conciliation between two entities who for 100 years have struggled for the exclusive possession of the same land. Now that the partition formula has been revived — a concept still not fully accepted by the oppositions on both sides — the process of pacification can only be slow and bumpy.

But the ice was broken in Oslo and resolution in the Middle East looks more real now than before. Regardless of the still unsatisfactory pace of negotiations between Israel and the PLO over their bilateral problems, other elements of pacification are slowly entering the scene, of which the Jordanian example is so far the most telling.

The notion that wars are futile seems to have been adopted by nearly all the contending establishments in the region and is slowly penetrating the uninformed masses as well. It is already stronger than the message of the unredeemed opponents of any compromise, who do not recognize the fatal dangers of the status quo and who want it to continue even at the risk of yet another armed confrontation. Their ability to sabotage the positive trend is now reduced, as shown by the relative drop in local terrorist attacks.

Yeshayahu Anug

Much has been written about the origins of the Oslo breakthrough. The accepted view is that the disintegration of the former Soviet Union and its subsequent withdrawal from a longstanding Arab alliance were major factors of change. But this explains only the Madrid conference and not the Oslo surprise. The latter was made possible by the political change in Israel which caught the right moment to engage the frustrated Palestinian leadership in a separate peace initiative. By then militant opposition to a Mideast settlement had passed from the Kremlin to Islamic fundamentalists.

But this new threat, like the one represented by the U.S.S.R. in other times, is of a global nature, as manifested by the terrorist attacks against Jewish institutions in Argentina and in Great Britain, and by terrorism in Egypt and in Northern Africa. It affects the new Asian republics of the former Soviet Union. Having become a world issue, Islamic fundamentalism must be handled by global engagement, that is, by a working alliance between the moderate Muslim countries and the West. Such a set-up would have been unthinkable in the recent past, but has now become a real possibility due to the common dangers confronted by the countries targeted by Islamic zealotry.

It is not all surprising that the process initiated by the Oslo agreement should have triggered the recent wave of worldwide Islamic terrorism, since if successful, the process will deprive extremist Islam of one of its most popular causes.

If the epicentre of the recent brand of Islamic terror is indeed Iran, that country will have to confront the consequences of its manipulations. In this respect, the surprising delivery of arch-terrorist Carlos by the government of Sudan, itself a fundamentalist country, to France, a country with a rather blurred record in handling lesser terrorist figures, raises interesting clues of a new trend in prosecuting international criminals. The information Carlos is already supplying to his interrogators in Paris and which will be made public in his forthcoming trial may well bring about international showdowns of unforeseeable consequences. His former host countries as well as his accomplices in the Palestinian terrorist circles have every reason to be worried.

Another sector where Islamic fundamentalism surpasses Hamas activities in the territories is in Southern Lebanon, with Hezbollah as the local protagonist. Contrary to the usual pattern of armed escalation which threatens to involve Syria, surprising developments should not be excluded here. Israel could now well consider reversing its position that only peace with Syria can put an end to the Hezbollah nuisance. It could be tempted to risk the transfer of the security zone it now controls, to the responsibility of the Lebanese Army which would be allowed to move to the Israeli border on the condition that it commits itself to eliminate the Hezbollah threat and proves its capability to do so.

Unthinkable as it may now sound, such a scheme could be actively supported by the United States in a binding accord with Syria. After all, the Syrian regime too is a potential target of Islamic fundamentalism and Hezbollah is one of its most violent branches. Such an option could positively affect an Israeli-Syrian settlement of the Golan issue and could well become the next sensational turn on the changing Mideastern scene.

But even without such a daring option, the Oslo accord has, by its very existence, already broadened its limited Israeli-Palestinian parameter. A natural offspring of the broken relationship between the defunct U.S.S.R. and the PLO, Oslo has shaken the Mideastern stalemate and opened new horizons for its peoples. Seen from a global perspective, one must recognize that in spite of the pitfalls which the peace process had to overcome and the difficult corners that it will have to negotiate, the Middle Eastern dispute now looks much more promising than the many contemporary tragedies in other corners of the world.

Turkey's Jewish community is integrated

By DANIEL PIPES

Jewish communities still extant in Muslim countries tend to be weak and without a future, mere shells of the vital populations that existed half a century ago. Anyone with energy or ambition long ago fled Iran, Yemen, Syria, Egypt, or Tunisia.

Those who remain barely eke out a living. They have no role to speak of in the business or intellectual life of their countries; politically they count only as potential victims or as hostages to be bartered away. In The Jews of Arab Lands in Modern Times (1991), Norman Stillman accurately describes them as "a small, vestigial, and moribund remnant."

How different in Turkey! Here Jews, as in the West, play a disproportionate role in the life of the country. During a visit not long ago to Istanbul (the city where nearly all the Turkish Jews live), I had an opportunity to meet two of the country's tycoons, both Jewish.

Jefi I. Kamhi is the flamboyant, jet-setting chair of Profilo, a company that produces almost everything you can think of (prefabricated construction units, white goods, parts and accessories); in addition, it imports and exports, distributes consumer durables, and invests.

Uzeyir Garih, CEO of Alarco, is a more restrained figure; his company contracts projects, engineers them, and specializes in building big-ticket items, such as pipelines, gas storage terminals, refineries, textile factories, and office complexes. Both men are active in business associations, are counted among their country's leading philanthropists, and have strong ties to the highest political circles.

Thanks to their knowledge of European languages and foreign contacts, Jewish businessmen have played an important role in the expansion of Turkish companies into international markets. They also have a prominent role in fashion, advertising, and banking. For example, Jews dominate Istanbul's Tahtakale money market and effectively set the dollar exchange rate for Turkey's currency. These Jews are not small, vestigial, or moribund.

And it's not just the businessmen. I didn't get to see Sami Kohen this trip, but he's been for many years the foreign affairs columnist for Turkey's largest circulation daily newspaper, Milliyet, where he writes a sophisticated analysis of his country's geopolitics, as well as frequently contributing to such American papers as The Christian Science Monitor and The New York Times.

Other Jews teach at the universities and work for the government, where they serve as diplomats and hold other positions of responsibility. In short, unlike the dying Jewish communities in other parts of the Muslim Middle East, the one in Turkey is vibrant and influential.

Interestingly, other Jews — those of Israel and the United States — also have a role in Turkey. In extensive talks with officials in the Ministry of Foreign Affairs and the Prime Minister's Office, I found a consistent interest in strengthening ties with Israel, and near delight with the Israel-PLO agreement because it hastens this process.

These analysts see Israel in a variety of ways: as a trading partner, a fellow democracy to help stabilize the region, an ally that can help deal with the Iranian and Syrian regimes, and a means of access to Washington.

The first-ever visit by Turkey's foreign minister Hikmet Cetin to Israel last November consolidated these ties and raised high hopes for the future.

Of course, Turkey also has its share of fundamentalist Muslims, fascists, and other types of anti-Semites. Like their counterparts elsewhere, these elements spread conspiracy theories about Jews and fulminate against Israel.

But in Turkey, unlike Iran and the Arab countries, these people don't make policy, nor do conspiracy theories dominate political thinking. Perhaps most important, Turks don't engage in violence against Jews. (It was foreigners, not Turks, who carried out the one major act of violence against Turkey's Jews, the 1986 bombing of Neve Shalom Synagogue.)

There's every reason to think the good news will continue in the years ahead — that Jews of Turkey will flourish; that Ankara's relations with Israel will expand; and that American Jews will play an important role explaining Turkey to Americans.

With regard to Jews, as is the case in so many other ways, Turkey has successfully removed itself from the paranoia and repression of the Middle East and made itself a part of the West.

Daniel Pipes edits the Middle East Quarterly.

Moroccan Islam tolerant, minister claims

By LARRY YUDELSON
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

With a portrait of His Majesty King Hassan and his country's red and green flag behind him, Serge Berdugo, who was visiting New York City recently, was the model of a perfect minister of tourism. He extolled Morocco's beaches, "world-class gastronomy" and sense of hospitality.

But Berdugo wears another hat as well, and it was equally evident when he addressed a meeting of the Conference of Presidents of Major American Jewish Organizations last month: As president of the Moroccan Jewish community, Berdugo is his country's ranking Jewish communal leader.

Though he lives in a Muslim country, and the community he heads has shrunk to below 10,000 members from 300,000 in 1948, Berdugo is adamant that his is not a "remnant" Jewish community.

It is instead one that thrives, he said, quickly attributing this phenomenon to the tolerance of the Moroccan monarch and people, and to the loyalty of Moroccan Jews in Europe, North America and Israel.

"Moroccan Islam is a gentle Islam that is tolerant, and very strong," he said, calling it "a force that permits the blossoming of Judaism.

"We're a very special country — absolutely Orthodox, but we live our religion merrily," he said. "Every hour of the day is immersed in the religion, and without any conflict."

Berdugo's ancestors settled in the country in 1490, refugees from the Spanish Inquisition. As King Ferdinand and Queen Isabella Christianized their kingdom, they expelled both Muslims and Jews.

"When you have experienced the same inquisition, and you are expelled together, when you come back to the same country you try to be fair to each other," said Berdugo.

Born in 1936, Berdugo studied in Paris and earned a law degree before becoming a successful industrialist. He was first elected to the Council of Jewish Communities in 1977. And in 1993 was appointed tourism minister, the first Jewish minister of his country since the 1950s.

At times Berdugo's various hats overlap easily. As he boasts of his Jewish community's increasing concern over preserving its heritage, he describes projects to restore synagogues, create a library and open a Jewish museum.

It is perhaps not coincidental that these efforts, carried out in conjunction with the World Assembly of Moroccan Jews, will be a further draw to Jewish tourists.

Similarly, as he described Morocco's role in the Middle East peace process, he made sure to include the tourism component.

"As minister of tourism, I am trying to boost relations between two countries as soon as possible; but that officially cannot be until there are political relations," said Berdugo.

While Morocco has long been normalizing its ties with Israel, it has so far not established formal relations with the Jewish state.

He said he was working with the Spanish government to create a commemorative route following the path taken by Spanish Jews, among them his ancestors, exiled in the 15th century.

Included in this plan is "another government," he said, smiling at the barely veiled reference to Israel, "in order to create a triangle. It's all being prepared, it will all be contingent on the (peace) process that we think will not be too long (in coming)."

For some years, Israelis born in Morocco have been allowed to visit the country. Now, Berdugo indicated, restrictions are being eased on others with Israeli passports. He said there are five licensed tour guides who speak Hebrew — Muslims trained by a rabbi in Strasbourg — and "now you go to a shuk and hear everybody speaking Hebrew."

As minister of tourism and president of the Jewish community, Berdugo is "trying to prepare religious ethnic tours" for non-Jews as well as Jews who "want to see what was the Jewish heritage."

His projects are not only with Jews: Under his auspices, Palestinians are studying in Morocco, training to operate hotels in Jericho and Gaza.

Alarming development

In recent months, four caches of weapons-grade nuclear materials from Russia have been seized in Germany, not enough to build an atomic bomb but enough to raise the dire possibility that an illegal and supremely profitable trade in highly enriched plutonium and uranium has begun. It is an alarming development. If sufficient quantities fall into the wrong hands, we could face an unprecedented international crisis.

For reasons best known to itself, the Russian government denies that nuclear materials are missing from its stocks. But Germany reportedly has incontrovertible evidence suggesting that this is simply not the case. Last week, Chancellor Helmut Kohl's personal emissary met with President Boris Yeltsin in Moscow and presented a damning report that should galvanize the Russians into prompt action.

It is no secret that Russia has yet to devise an effective system to protect its stockpile of bomb-usable plutonium and uranium. By all accounts, Russia possesses 170 tons of military and civilian plutonium and 1,000 tons of highly-enriched uranium. A full-fledged atomic bomb could be built with as little as 13 pounds of weapons-grade nuclear material, and it doesn't take much of an imagination to realize that terrorists and rogue countries like Iran, Iraq or Libya could terrorize the world with it. In fact, the three aforementioned countries have tried or are still trying to build a nuclear device. If they succeed, the Middle East, if not the rest of the globe, could be thrown into utter turmoil. It is a scenario which threatens our peace and stability.

In cooperation with Russia, it is incumbent on the West to ensure that Russian stockpiles of nuclear materials are kept under lock and key. However, at the moment, no such foolproof system appears to exist in Russia, a nation which has been convulsed by upheaval and chaos since the dissolution of the Soviet Union in 1991. "It's possible to buy anything in our country, including weapons and samples," a Russian scientist told the New York Times recently.

It is time for Russia to get its house in order, and soon. Potential nuclear blackmailers must be stopped in their tracks. The fate of our civilization may well hang in the balance.

Creative economics

There may be some debate these days over the real meaning of Israel's economic process but one thing is certain: the government is dedicated to exploring new and creative measures designed to enhance Israel's economic profile.

Since June 20, Israel has had a Free Export Processing Zone (FEPZ). According to Andrew Silow Carroll, writing in Moment magazine, the zone, near Beersheva, will be a free market enclave with 20 years of tax benefits for businesses who relocate to the area.

Designed primarily as an export centre, the zone will also enjoy exemptions from import duties and some foreign currency restrictions. Israeli law bearing upon environmental standards, child labor, security and workers' wages will prevail in the FEPZ.

The architects of this new free zone concept hope that 20,000 new jobs will be created as a result of investments that will be flowing into the Beersheva area. Israel's highly skilled manpower — especially the large pool of immigrants from the former Soviet Union — is expected to be a magnet for electronic and high tech firms.

The projected FEPZ is not an abstract idea: more than 100 high-tech companies have already expressed interest in the zone. In the Moment article, Carroll says the umbrella organization which is directing the new zone, Israel Export Development Company Ltd., is made up, among others, of major American investors who have a deep commitment to Israel.

Israel, of course, is not the first country to set up a free trade zone. More than 50 countries in Asia, Africa and Central America are already involved in such economic enterprises but many have failed because of unstable political conditions in the countries involved. Israel's relatively stable political and military climate — the result of agreements between Israel, Egypt, the PLO, Jordan (and perhaps even Syria some day) — suggests that the time is now propitious for Israel to launch its FEPZ.

Israel has always dreamed of becoming the Swtizerland of the Middle East. That dream, however, abutted the sharp reality of four decades of protracted warfare with hostile Arab neighbors. Perhaps now, in the new era, the dream will come closer to fruition.

Letters to the Editor

Letters are welcome if they are brief, in English or French, typewritten with lines double spaced, and of interest to our reading public. Readers are cautioned not to make sweeping claims against persons or institutions which they cannot verify, as libel laws are very stringent. We reserve the right to edit and condense letters, which must bear the sender's address, phone number and both handwritten and typed signatures.

MEDIA SUPPORT

I have been organizing community blood-testing clinics to help leukemia and aplastic anemia patients find compatible bone marrow donors since 1990. The community needs to be made aware that the cure for these forms of cancer already exists; in fact, everyone walking down the street is a potential cure for somebody else.

From the very first Canadian drive for Allison Atlas, which ultimately spawned the massive Elizabeth Lue campaign, to the most recent of several Canadian testings for Jay Feinberg, The Canadian Jewish News has been amazing in its constant, complete and sensitive coverage.

In particular, CJN reporter Leila Speisman has been an integral part of our team since that first testing date, providing pre-drive publicity and post-drive reports, including emphasizing the critical need for donations to fund future drives. The fact is that we could never ever expect to get the turnout that we consistently get in our community without media coverage.

I would like to express my deepest thanks, on behalf of Friends of Allison Atlas, the Elizabeth Lue Memorial Fund, and Friends of Jay Feinberg, for the primary role that The Canadian Jewish News and Ms. Speisman, have played in the direct success of these campaigns over the past four years.

INTERGENERATIONAL EXCHANGES

Looking through the Aug. 18 CJN, I saw a picture in the Community Focus supplement on page 4. It shows four seniors — three women and a man.

Under the picture are just a few lines saying "Younger and older intergenerational players performing a play at the Betel Centre with students from Pleasant Public school."

There are no names of the participants and no picture of the youngsters. I would like to tell the story behind the picture since I was one of the senior participants.

For about four years I've been involved in the intergenerational pen-pal program from this school. It is a project which gives Grade 5 students an opportunity to learn about seniors through the exchange of letters. During the years I had three students with whom I corresponded and we became friends. Before the school season ended, they made a tea party where we met for the first time. We all exchanged some little presents and I was very moved to read the few lines one of my little pen-pals attached to my gift.

The words were written by Helen Keller. The note said: "The best and most beautiful things in the world cannot be seen or even touched. They must be felt with the heart." What a wonderful thought from a 10-year-old to add those special lines! It was a pleasure to see the young children and white-haired seniors engaged in conversations and laughter.

WE MUST ACKNOWLEDGE TRANSNISTRIA

Re: "Transnistra — the forgotten cemetery."

Transnistria was the fictitious name established to designate an area of Ukraine (located between the rivers Dniestre and Bug), specifically assigned for the purposes of sending all the Jews from the Romanian provinces of Bessarabia and Bukovina to their death. (See CJN story June 23.)

The geographic entity was simulated from 1941 to 1944, when the Red Army freed those still alive. Upon their liberation, the survivors were assumed to be Soviet citizens, without ever having their identity acknowledged as Jews surviving Nazi atrocities.

After 1944, Transnistria ceased to exist (having completed the inhumanity for which it was created). But despite its lack of recognition, it remains the grounds for mass graves for over 117,000 Jewish people brought to their torturous deaths in a variety of cruel and harrowing ways.

What's worse, those that survived suffer beyond the trauma and despair they share with survivors from the more well-known concentration camps; for they also share the pain and indignity of having their torment ignored (even amongst some of the most well-informed specialists). Their anguish is not mourned by remembrance prayers, their grief not shared by fellow Jews or gentiles.

The least we as mankind can do now (with Romania no longer a Communist country) is to acknowledge Transnistria and the abomination ordered by former Romanain leader Ion Antonescu against the Jews. As well, with Ukraine freed from communism and having better relations with Israel, we owe it to the survivors to ask for Ukraine's public recognition of the existence of Transnistria on their soil.

SOME SURVIVED

Two young men were sent out to guard a cave in the thick forest. A group of Slovak Jews were hiding in the cave trying to save their lives from Slovak fascists and Nazi soldiers. It happened 50 years ago in November 1944.

Shivering from cold, one of the youngsters heard a suspicious noise and went back to the cave to warn the group about the impending discovery.

One member of the group, Armin Breuer, took aside his young son, Alex, saying, "You have your Christian documents with you. Show them to the fascist scoundrels and tell them that you don't belong to us. You just came into the cave to warm up after a cold, rainy day. Tell them that you are on your way to your family in Bratislava."

Refusing to listen to his son's protest, he pushed Alex to the other side of the cave, far from the Jewish group.

A few minutes later the Hlinka Guard's elite unit, set up for chasing Jews and partisans, broke into the cave, pushed out the group, poking the people with their guns and cursing them.

Alex went to the commander, showed him his documents and told him his story. He was sent aside and told headquarters would investigate his case.

Alex Breuer miraculously survived the war, but Armin and Ida Breuer were massacred together with their group in Kremnicka.

Last year my family revisited Czechoslovakia. We heard that after the war a monument was erected in Kremnicka to commemorate the murdered.

When we arrived, only few people knew where the memorial was. No sign marked the way.

At last we found the place. The "memorial" was a huge stone triangle with a triple cross and an illegible note. Beside this "memorial" was a little tablet noting that 719 people were hanged there. No mention of Jews or partisans. Nothing.

In May 1994 10 great-grandchildren, four grandchildren and two surviving children gathered in Yad Vashem to commemorate the 50th anniversary of the Breuer parents' horrible murder.

There a simple marble plaque will remind the family's future generations of the murder of their ancestors.

Alex told about his parents' life and death, grandson Baruch recited the Kaddish and a great-granddaughter, Yael, played a mournful melody on her flute honoring her great-grandparents.

These people are the only remnants of the once large Breuer family. Grandparents, aunts, uncles and their children all perished in Auschwitz.

Looking at the group, the offspring of my husband's family, I realized that Hitler's and the Slovak fascists' plan — the complete destruction of the Jews — was not entirely successful; and we will live forever.

A useless diploma and a change of career

By RABBI W. GUNTHER PLAUT

Cleaning out some cupboards a few weeks ago I came across a small announcement. When I looked at it, a whole flood of memories invaded my mind. For a remarkable coincidence had occurred: it came to hand on July 25, 1994, and the date on the paper was July 25, 1934 — exactly 60 years before.

I remembered the day which, in a strange way, marked the turning point of my life.

In the early 1930s I studied law at the universities of Heidelberg and Berlin. Hitler came into power and though I had graduated from law school, my legal career had ground to a halt. It was customary in those days to write a doctoral thesis and fulfil requirements which differed between universities. In Berlin, it included a public defence of certain legal theses and an announcement, duly printed in a pre-set form, posted on the university's bulletin boards (This was the announcement I had chanced upon). The public was invited to hear doctoral applicants display their legal acumen.

I think the University of Berlin was the only one in Germany that still abided by this medieval ritual, for a ritual it was. The three opponents usually were friends of the debator and had been duly briefed. They would raise pre-set objections to the various theses and the candidate would demolish their arguments.

Rabbi Plaut

My proposition dealt with some obscure aspects of German law, the significance of which totally escapes me today. I do remember that my "opponents" did well and I did my share, and the colorful assembly of faculty jurists did their part — in short, I was declared a Doctor of Laws, and signed my name in the folio volume as number 588, joining those who had gone through the same ritual during the 125 years of the university.

My three opponents were Heinz Frank (later to be the western director of Canadian Jewish Congress), Heinz Kellerman (later a counsellor at the State Department in Washington), and Dr. Bruno Sommerfeld (later, under the name of Bruno Bernard, a popular Hollywood photographer who created the famous Marilyn Monroe image with the swirling skirt).

The ceremony was an oddity, for Hitler and his gang were already in power, and my legal career had been officially cancelled. I was a young man with certificates in my briefcase, but no job opportunities.

As usual, my Dad had a suggestion I was glad to follow.

He believed that sooner or later I would be able to return to my legal career. "Meanwhile," he suggested, "why don't you go to the rabbinical seminary and take some courses? I have already talked with Rabbi Leo Baeck, and he said he would be glad to have you as an auditing student. You will study what it truly means to be a Jew; and in the end it will all be for your best. You will be a lawyer and a knowledgeable Jew to boot." Those were not his exact words, but that was the meaning.

Dad also arranged for me to beef up my knowledge of Hebrew. He engaged a young man who came to the house, clicked his heels and bowed from the waist. "My name is Abraham Joshua Heschel," he introduced himself, "and I am supposed to increase your Hebrew knowledge." How was I to know my tutor would someday be an inspiration to millions of Jews around the world?

So I went to the seminary, understood little at first, but was entranced by Dr. Baeck's lectures on midrash and the art of preaching. One day he received a letter from Dr. Julian Morgenstern in Cincinnati, which asked him to send five promising students to the United States for rabbinical training. He picked me as one of the five and thus saved my life.

I have never forgotten that I began my Jewish studies lishmah, for their own sake, and with no motive other than to learn more about Judaism. It so happened that it also became a career for me, but that was not my original motivation. Studying Torah lishmah was the golden key that opened the door to my future life; it is the golden key to a more meaningful and satisfying Judaism for anyone. The reward that one gets from it is better than any diploma.

So, what better wish to all my readers than that Judaism may become more meaningful to you in the New Year — not because it is a career, but because it is a blessing which is in everyone's reach.

Tuning in to the deaf culture

By FRANCES KRAFT

I travelled less than 20 km to the National Congress of Jewish Deaf convention earlier this summer, but I feel as if I went to a foreign country. The week-long event, which transformed part of Toronto's Sheraton Centre Hotel into an island of deaf people, was both a cultural celebration and a learning experience.

The "deaf culture" — a relatively new concept to me — is a unique phenomenon in which deaf people, particularly the younger generation, take pride. Sign language is an important component of this culture.

Yet deaf people don't want to be isolated from the hearing community. Rabbi Douglas Goldhamer of Chicago's Congregation Bene Shalom of the Deaf explained to me that just as chassidic Jews in the United States want to be accepted as Americans (but not at the expense of their Chassidism), so too do deaf people want to be accepted as part of the greater community without having to relinquish their culture.

As a hearing journalist, I was made to feel welcome, and I was told repeatedly that hearing people are welcome at meetings of the Toronto Jewish Association for the Deaf (TJAD).

I was intrigued by the applause that followed each presentation, affording a small window into the deaf world. Although there was some restrained hand-clapping, most people waved their hands high in the air, their facial expressions reflecting their appreciation.

I learned that this type of silent applause came into popular use a number of years ago to better reflect the deaf experience. It saddened me to hear from two sources that people who still clap their hands are considered by some of the more militant deaf to be "Uncle Toms." This minority population, it seems to me, can ill afford divisiveness.

Silent applause used

I was touched to find there was more hand-clapping (instead of hand-waving) for hearing speakers at the convention, as a way of being polite.

Courtesy was also evident when I spoke to hearing or hard-of-hearing people, and they signed while answering me verbally so that others who were nearby would understand.

I was aware of my "hearingness," as one woman put it, and felt at a loss because I couldn't sign. On a trip to Mexico last year, I got by on Sesame Street Spanish and a few phrases from a teach-yourself book. At the convention I lacked even rudimentary sign language vocabulary.

A (hearing) cousin of mine who works at the Bob Rumball Centre for the Deaf was staffing a display table. She taught me the signs for "I'm hearing" and "I don't understand." I used the signs later in the day and felt less like a tourist.

I began to comprehend the barriers deaf people face in the hearing world. Specifically, I began to understand the barriers deaf Jews face in accessing the Jewish world. I was shocked to learn of deaf Jews who have been lost or almost lost to Judaism because in their communities, it was a church that provided their sole accessible spiritual outlet.

I learned that attitudes are changing and accessibility is improving — but slowly. I know of only three synagogues in the Toronto area which have ever initiated or are planning to initiate outreach programs to the deaf. I hope to hear of more.

Dry Bones

Be sure to check those Jewish best before dates

By ALLAN GOULD

You know, there are a lot of things to worry about in this world, especially if you are Jewish: Will Israel be safe? Will anti-Semitism ever stop? Will that chazzan ever finish that Musaf?

These are questions which have haunted the Jewish people for years, and the answer never seems clear, does it?

And now, we Jews — actually, everyone in North America, come to think of it — have something new to worry about, as if we didn't have enough before: Will your can of soft drink be fresh, or has it passed its "freshness" date?

You must have seen the articles in the newspapers, and certainly you must have caught the advertisements on TV: Pepsi-Cola, quickly followed by Coca-Cola, have now put best before dates on their cans, so that we should never — G-d forbid! — have the mortification of popping open a can at a bar mitzvah, wedding, or divorce, and discover that the carbonation is no longer at its peak. (Oy! Such a shanda!!)

This is something which I had never worried much about but it was a great relief; I was getting pretty tired of worrying only about the Jewish State and the ubiquitousness of anti-Semitism. (About our chazzan, I've pretty well given up; the Mashiach will probably come several hours before he ever finishes that Musaf.)

Then, I said to myself (yes, I do talk to myself all the time; you wanna make something of it?), "Allan?"

"Yes," I answered, as other people in shul started to point at me and laugh.

"Allan," I said, again. "Why should there not be best before dates in Jewish Life, as well? Why just on pop cans?"

"You're right!" I cried out, as people on both sides of me started to move away.

And so, here it is: Allan Gould's reommended "best befores" for Jewish well-being:

On the tongues of our Jewish children: There should be a stamp which reads: Best Before he/she turns 14; after this, do not expect as easy a ride.

On boxes of matzah: There should be a statement declaring, Because this is matzah, it will taste best before the year 5799 (or the year 2039 in the regular calendar). If you expect it to taste fresh at any time, you clearly don't know your matzah.

On $50 and $100 bills, there should be a note which reads, in Hebrew or Yiddish: This money should be given to tzedakah, and best before Yom Kippur, if you wish to be written in the Book of Life.

On the back of books with the Birkat Ha-Mazon (Grace After Meals): This is best sung before you leave the table, and best sung after you finish eating.

On tallesim, there should be a stamp which declares, This tallis is best worn before noon, on weekdays, preferably in the early morning, except on Kol Nidre night when it is best of all. Use it in good health.

Allan Gould

Upon Kosher calves' liver there should be stamped: Best before enough salt is put on this to kosher it, and make it as delicious and juicy as shoe leather. But if you are kosher, you are kosher, and that is that. May be used for chopped liver, in which several gallons of mayonnaise, along with eggs, just could make it edible once more. We're not making any promises, though.

On the walls of a sukkah. This sukkah is best used before Simchat Torah. After that, you will look pretty silly, and you could well freeze, if you are a Canadian Jew.

On Shabbat candles, etched in the wax, it should be written: Best lit before it gets dark on Friday nights, preferably 18 minutes, if not more. Didn't you ever watch when bubbie did it?

On certain Hebrew teachers I know, stamped on their foreheads: This teacher is best used before he/she turns 50, or before he/she is just plain used up, whichever comes first. Maybe if you paid him/her better, this dating would be unnecessary.

On mezuzot: This is best kissed before one enters and leaves this house.

On dogs and cats, amidst their fur, should be etched: This pet should be fed before the Jewish owner feeds him-or-herself. Don't you know your Talmud?

On maps of the State of Israel, there should be marked: This is best visited annually, if not-more often. Come to think of it, why not live here? What kind of Zionist are you, anyway? You give a few bucks each year, and you think that lets you off the hook?

On the knees of bubbies and zaydes there should be a stamp: Best seen before she/he turns 120. Actually, best seen weekly, for best results and greatest influence on children and grandchildren. Give a call today!

On the outside of Torah arks, there should be written: The Torahs in here should best be read aloud on Shabbat, Mondays and Thursdays. However, the rules herein should be followed every single day of your life, if you know what's good for you. And if you study this book daily, you'll know what's good for you. Get it?

And, of course, on a personal matter — on the mouth of my chazzan, there should be written: This cantor is best used before noon on Shabbat mornings; after that time, he may go bad. In fact, make that 11 a.m.

See what I mean? Pepsi and Coke might have something there, and dating on Jewish objects and people could be the answer to a lot of our problems. Now, as for that other kind of "Jewish dating," check the personals column in this week's issue. And mazel tov! (If it works out).

Allan Gould is the author of 21 books. His latest, Criminal Acts, an anthology of true crime in Canada, is coming out this fall — and is best before Chanukah, if you get my drift. Actually, his What Did They Think Of The Jews? is pretty good too.

Discomfort in eastern Germany

Sheldon Kirshner visits two Jewish communities — Dresden and eastern Berlin — in what was East Germany.

By SHELDON KIRSHNER

Herbert Lappe professes to feel no nostalgia for the old German Democratic Republic (East Germany), a Marxist state which vanished four years ago with the fall of the Berlin Wall and the subsequent unification of Germany.

Lappe, a Communist in the old days, regards East Germany as a closed chapter in his life. Nevertheless, he maintains a certain fondness for it. Yes, East Germany was totalitarian and people's lives were circumscribed. But it was safer and more secure, at least as far as Jews are concerned.

A resident of Dresden and a prominent member of the minuscule Jewish community, Lappe maintains that the Communist authorities, for all their faults, invariably suppressed all manifestations of neo-Nazism. The exception to that rule occurred in the last three years of East Germany's existence, when the regime's control faltered.

"After 1987," said Lappe, "you could see swastikas painted on walls, and you could hear jokes about Jews and anti-Semitic jibes at football games."

Last year, in May and September, the Jewish cemetery — which was barely disturbed by the Nazis — was desecrated, with gravestones overturned and defaced with anti-Semitic graffiti.

And a window in the synagogue was smashed, and a Torah scroll stolen.

The new climate of racial intolerance, which has swept both halves of Germany since unification in 1990, hit still closer to home when Lappe's son, Moritz, was beaten up by toughs to the shout of anti-Semitic insults.

"We went to the police, but nothing happened," said Lappe, an engineer and management consultant who was born in London in 1946 but raised in Dresden. "The police should have reacted immediately. It frightens me that they didn't. I can tell you that Jews here are very concerned by the emergence of neo-Nazism in eastern Germany."

In desperation, Lappe wrote an anguished letter to Steffen Heitmann, the justice minister of the province of Saxony. He received no reply.

"We were completely integrated into German society before unification," he added. "Now I feel uncomfortable, like a Jew in Germany rather than a German Jew. For the first time, I'm thinking of leaving Germany." It's a sentiment, he believes, that is shared by the majority of Jews in Dresden.

On these issues, Lappe's colleague, Heinz-Joachim Aris — the 60-year-old executive director of Dresden's Jewish community — doesn't feel as strongly as he does. But he, too, is filled with angst over the developments of the past several years.

"The government," he declared, "should fully enforce its laws against right-wing extremists, and be as vigilant toward radicals on the right as radicals on the left."

* * *

Dresden, a beautiful city of inspired Gothic and Renaissance architecture on the Elbe River, is the capital of Saxony. Its Jewish community, which dates back to the 14th century, reached its peak during the Weimar period, when its population was about 6,000.

Dresden's venerable synagogue was destroyed by the Nazis on Kristallnacht in November 1938. By 1939, fewer than 2,000 Jews remained in the city. The deportations that followed emptied Dresden and neighboring cities of nearly all their Jews.

Lappe's father, from Chemnitz, and his mother, an Austrian Jew from Graz, emigrated from Germany in 1933. A handful of Jews, such as Aris' mixed-race family, never left.

Under the 1935 Nuremberg Laws, which disenfranchised Jews and forbade mixed marriages, Aris was classified as a mischling of the first degree. His father was Jewish. His mother was not. He and his sister, who lives in Chemnitz today, were registered as Jews and were thus vulnerable to persecution.

"We suffered humiliations," recalled Aris, an economist by profession. "We were required to wear a yellow star. We weren't allowed into restaurants, cinemas and parks. Public transportation was off-limits to us. My father was a forced laborer."

In February 1945, three months before the end of the war, the family was scheduled to be deported to the Theresienstadt concentration camp in Czechoslovakia.

But fate intervened.

Allied aircraft, in one of the most devastating raids against Germany, firebombed Dresden exactly on the day they were to be rounded up.

That bombardment killed tens of thousands of civilians and left Dresden in ruins. The Arises survived because they did not live in the centre of the city.

Aris' father, Helmut, was a Communist loyalist in the workers' state which arose in eastern Germany in the late 1940s. Indeed, he was a dominant figure in the Jewish community, which never had more than several hundred registered members, and he edited the community's newspaper.

Lappe's father returned to Chemnitz from Britain in 1948 before settling down in Dresden. "He felt like a German and wanted to build a new socialist Germany," said Lappe.

"We were treated very well as Jews," observed Lappe. "There was no connection between our status and the government's hostile attitude toward Israel."

As victims of fascism, Jews in East Germany were given preferential treatment, Lappe explained. "We had better food rations, better health services, and guaranteed lifetime jobs. And also, the Jewish community got all the help it needed."

Heinz-Joachim Aris [Frank Schroder]

But, Lappe admitted, there was a price to pay. "We had to be quiet about the government's policy toward Israel." East Germany was the only member of the Warsaw Pact that never established formal diplomatic relations with Israel, although East German Jews were sometimes permitted to visit relatives there.

Of East Germany's several thousand Jews, the majority did not identify with the Jewish community. "Their commitment and identity were primarily socialist," writes Toronto sociologist Robin Ostow, an authority on German-Jewish affairs.

In the early 1950s, the Central Committee of the Communist party, in line with directives from the Soviet Union, accused Jews of being "Zionist and American agents of imperialism." Jews were purged from positions of power, and leaders of the tiny Jewish community were interrogated and asked to sign statements which equated Zionism with fascism, writes Ostow.

During this tense era, Lappe's father — an electrical engineer — had no problems. However, Aris' father, a factory manager, was imprisoned for several months.

With Josef Stalin's death in 1953, the crisis subsided, anti-Jewish measures were rescinded, and Jews who had lost their positions were reinstated.

A handful of Jews, who never officially belonged to the Jewish community, were key figures in the regime. Markus Wolf headed the foreign intelligence bureau. Klaus Gysi was secretary of state for religion. Hermann Axen and Albert Norden sat on the ruling Politburo. Hilde Benjamin was minister of justice. Gerhard Eisler was chief commentator on East German radio.

Apart from East Berlin, Dresden and Chemnitz (formerly Karl Marx Stadt), there are organized Jewish communities in Leipzig, Erfurt, Magdeburg and Halle.

According to Ostow, Jewish communities were the recipients of large government grants to repair and renovate their synagogues.

Dresden, which is home to 86 registered Jews, 40 of whom are recent Soviet immigrants, benefited from this largesse.

A new synagogue, replacing the one the Nazis had destroyed, was erected in 1950. It is adjacent to the cemetery, which contains some 4,000 headstones.

Dresden has neither a rabbi nor a cantor, much less a Jewish school, but on Jewish high holidays, a rabbi from Berlin leads services, attended usually only by the elderly.

Irene Runge [Frank Schroder]

According to the caretaker, there have been no weddings and bar-mitzvahs in Dresden for ages. Virtually all the Jewish males in the community are married to Christians. Lappe, who also has a non-Jewish wife, has three children (aged 15,16 and 26). They are registered with the community as Jews.

To Lappe, the community's main problem, neo-Nazism notwithstanding, is a shortage of funds. "We can't cover our costs." But help is on its way. Recently, the government of Saxony announced it would disburse DM 900,000 ($500,000 US) annually for the next decade to assist Jewish communities in that province.

* * *

On Jan. 1, 1991, the Jewish communities in East and West Berlin merged. But a foreign visitor still comes away with the impression that the two communities are separate and distinct.

Irene Runge, born in New York City in 1942, is one of the leading personalities in eastern Berlin.

A self-styled "red-diaper baby," Runge is a sociologist and community activist whose parents were ardent communists. During the McCarthyist epoch in the United States, they returned to Germany, settling in East Berlin.

Brought up as an atheist and internationalist, without any grounding in Jewish culture or religion, Runge did not set foot inside a synagogue until she was 19. "I didn't know what it meant to be Jewish," she said. "I was completely secular."

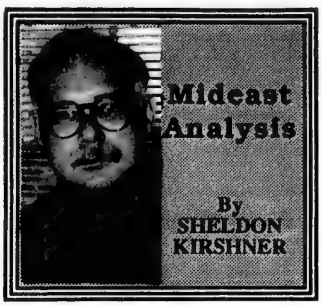
She was never a member of the Communist party, having been rejected for membership three times. "I didn't smell like them, and they didn't want me in their group."

Through a friend, Hermann Simon, she was introduced to the non-religious Jewish community, which is affiliated with the Oranienberger synagogue. In 1985, she joined a newly-formed club, Jews for Jews, now known as the Jewish Cultural Organization. It sponsors a whole range of cultural programs for German and Russian-speaking members. Runge, a member of the board, said that membership has climbed to about 1,000.

"We're a secular, left-wing organization," she said, "but we're in regular touch with an Orthodox rabbi in Jerusalem. And on high holidays such as Passover, we're supervised by a Lubavitch rabbi."

By her estimate, several hundred Jews belong to the non-religious community in eastern Berlin. Runge tries to maintain cordial relations with the Orthodox community, embodied in the Adass Jisroel congregation, but "it's a little bit complicated with our neighbors."

Like many Jews in Germany's eastern zone, Runge had qualms about German unification. But of late, she has revised her view. "It's less terrible than I thought. Now I can see there are advantages for a country to be unified."



Four years after its invasion and annexation of Kuwait, Iraq is a spent force in the Middle East. But its authoritarian leader, Saddam Hussein, is still very much in command.

By committing aggression against Kuwait, Iraq brought an unparalleled disaster upon itself — political isolation, a war it had no chance of winning, the partial obliteration of its armed forces and the near destruction of its economy.

Today, Iraq is subject to a strict United Nations economic embargo enforced by the United States and its allies. And if Washington has its way, the sanctions — which do not affect the import of food and medical supplies — will remain in place until Iraq fully complies with UN resolutions.

After a series of cat-and-mouse games with the UN commission monitoring Iraqi compliance, Iraq is finally cooperating. Baghdad has allowed cameras to be installed at its principal missile-testing sites, supplied the UN with lists of weapons suppliers and, most important, agreed to accept long-term inspection of its main industrial facilities.

The objective is to ensure that Iraq does not — and cannot — develop nuclear, chemical and biological weapons or long-range missiles.

Yet Iraq has not been completely defanged. According to a U.S. congressional study, Iraq — which armed itself to the teeth before the 1991 Gulf War — still has something like 2,500 battle tanks and 250 fixed-wing aircraft at its disposal. Iraq can thus protect its borders, but can no longer project its military power beyond them.

Citing Iraqi cooperation, France and Russia have called for the easing of sanctions against Iraq. But the United States — which has taken the lead in punishing Iraq — is adamantly opposed because of Iraq's hostile attitude toward Kuwait and its execrable human rights record.

Embargo plagues Iraq

Although Iraq's rubber-stamp parliament has officially annulled the 1990 annexation of Kuwait, the government-controlled media refers to Kuwait as Iraq's 19th province. And Iraq has not accepted the newly-demarcated boundary between itself and Kuwait as mandated by the UN.

Iraq, too, has failed to return or account for some 800 Kuwaitis who were captured during Iraq's five-month occupation. And Saddam has continued his military campaign against the Shi'ite population of southern Iraq, the group which tried to unseat him in a rebellion in March 1991, just as the Gulf War ended.

Furthermore, Baghdad is deliberately draining the pristine marshes inhabited by the Marsh Arabs — an ancient minority who've been ruthlessly driven from their homes — and harassing the Kurds.

Last but not least, Iraq has resisted a UN plan for selling $1.6 billion worth of its oil every six months, claiming the scheme is an infringement of its sovereignty (which has already been violated by so-called no-fly zones established by the United States in northern and southern Iraq.)

Under the proposed arrangement, profits from the sales would compensate Kuwait for war damage, help defray the costs of the UN monitoring teams in Iraq, and be used for humanitarian purposes in Iraq.

For most Iraqis, life has become a grim struggle for survival. In a report, the UN Food and Agricultural Organization says that Iraq is experiencing "mass deprivation, chronic hunger and endemic undernutrition."

Inflation since 1990 has reached 4,000 per cent and production has fallen drastically. As a result, numerous middle-class families have been reduced to penury.

Iraq has managed to rebuild bridges, plants, telephone and electrical systems shattered by Allied bombings. But Iraq will not be able to return to normal unless the sanctions are lifted, a possibility that is dependent on the United States.

For the moment, the prospects for Iraq look dim. The Clinton administration has yet to be convinced that Iraq should be allowed back into the family of nations. Certainly, Iraq continues to flout UN resolutions. In the meantime, Saddam hangs on, defying the world and fending off attempted coups from rivals who lack the strength or the resources to replace him.

Jewish continuity debate

During the past year, much has been spoken and written about Jewish continuity: our survival as a spiritual community, linked to each other, to our history and tradition, and to Israel. In June, the continuity task force of the Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto issued its report and recommendations, which elicited a wide range of responses.

Aaron Brotman, chair of the task force, addresses some of these responses, including that of Rabbi Dow Marmur, spiritual leader of Toronto's Holy Blossom Temple.

As we search for ways to achieve Jewish continuity, we must also continue to define it. Marcy Goldman's account of her grandmother's legacy gives insight into just what Jewish continuity is all about.

By RABBI DOW MARMUR

The congregation I serve has for many years acted according to about half of the 80 or so recommendations made by the Task Force on Jewish Continuity in its recently submitted report to the Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto.

We are, therefore, flattered by the implied, though probably unintentional, expression of confidence in our work. But did we really need an elaborate document, two years in the making, to tell us what we already know?

Most of the other 40 recommendations are intended for the community at large, primarily the Federation itself. But it is not likely that many of these will blaze new trails in the struggle for a meaningful Jewish life as the 20th century draws to a close. The most original calls for an initial annual allocation of $1.2 million. As there is no suggestion that the money might be found within the existing budget, it is to be assumed that it will be taken from those funds now being sent to Israel.

Rabbi Marmur

Continuity has become not only the current "in" word in the Diaspora, but also a code for keeping more money at home. Rabbi Jonathan Sacks, the spiritual leader of mainstream British Orthodoxy, advocates it explicitly; others, including the Toronto report, are more circumspect. The underlying naive assumption is that the Diaspora can go it alone, as soon as it gets its lines of communication sorted out, and as long as it has the administrative and financial clout to do more more programming.

Which brings me to what I perceive to be the first major flaw in the report: its apparent lack of interest in substantive Israel-Diaspora cooperation. It does not seem to recognize the implications of the centrality of Israel in the quest for Jewish identity.

The report is eloquent about the need for more Jewish education. Had it suggested, for example, that the community spend $1.2 milion a year to bring 500 young women and men to Israel as a reward for having completed 10 years of Jewish schooling, it would have made sense to take the money from the Jewish Agency and give it to this project. Both the Israeli economy and Jewish continuity would have benefited, and Jewish education here would have been greatly stimulated.

The recommendations could have also followed another path. The report is adamant about the need to integrate new immigrants. Why not propose that each year 500 young women and men from among them be sent at community expense for an intensive course in Israel? Surely, $1.2 million better spent than on the creation of yet another committee.

The report could have made a similar proposal about singles, of whom it speaks with apparent concern but to whom it offers little hope. Most singles would like to be married, but haven't found a partner yet. An annual massive international get-together in Israel for Diaspora communities around the world, with the ostensible aim to study Judaism and the hidden agenda of finding a spouse, would be a most effective response. To subsidize such travel would be a mitzvah.

Studies of Jewish identity, like the one recently sponsored by the Avichai Foundation, make it clear that a well-planned educational stay in Israel is second only to a day-school education in securing Jewish continuity. There is also good reason to believe that, for projects of this kind, additional money can be found from individual donors.

A second flaw in the report is its timidity. The way it deals with intermarriage is a case in point. Though, to its credit, it does not avoid the issue, it is unduly adamant about the need to tell the Jewish public about the different attitudes and practices of the various denominations, and far too reticent about an effective communal outreach program that would integrate intermarrieds.

Why didn't the task force recommend bringing the various religious groups together to create a joint program of conversion? It is not enough to quote complaints about the divisive community, which the report does, without offering effective ways of tearing down the barriers. And why does the report dwell on the difficulties after conversion more than on opportunities for true integration?

Perhaps greater emphasis on outreach would have led the report to a stronger affirmation of the synagogue as the centre of Diaspora life. For all its respectful talk about the synagogue, and its call for closer cooperation between Federation and congregations, the report has little to say about the community's duty to give synagogues the respect and support they deserve.

By AARON BROTMAN

It has been approximately two months since the Task Force on Jewish Continuity, Assimilation and Intermarriage submitted its report to the community and the Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto. As chair of the Task Force, I would now like to reflect on the reaction to, and the current status of, the report which, it will be remembered, called for urgency in dealing with the issues it addressed.

This article will not defend the report. Quite the contrary; there is no pride of ownership that excludes commentary, criticism, discussion and the free exchange of ideas — and not only from those professionally or organizationally involved. The complexity and urgency of the issues require all of our combined energies, skills and resources if we are to have any hope of success. Continued discussion is not only welcome, it is encouraged.

Aaron Brotman

It is necessary, however, to react to some of the many comments that have been made.

We have been told that the report was well- written and presented. It was generally well received. But there were also many comments that some areas had been omitted or should have received greater emphasis. I would like to respond to these comments under three general headings: skepticism, the Israel connection, and education.

- Skepticism: This is a valid and acceptable reaction. We have been down this path before and have not addressed some issues satisfactorialy: youth; a better integrated and united community (federations, synagogues, religious divisiveness . . .) .

We agree with and understand this reaction. It is up to us to accept this challenge and prove it is not "business as usual." It is clear that the old way is no longer working and that we must address these concerns with newfound strengths and initiatives.

- Israel Connection: A number of people have commented on the lack of recommendations pertaining to our connection with Israel and its bond, in turn, to our people. I believe these comments are justified and indicate a flaw in the report.

We would hope and expect that the Israeli connection will be addressed as part of future recommendations and initiatives.

- Education: Many people have commented that the importance of a formal Jewish education is, as it has always been, at the core of Jewish identity and tradition. The Task Force agrees and includes Jewish education as one of its three listed priorities, together with family life education and initiatives directed to young adults.

We were unable to include specific comments from the Commission on Jewish Education in our report because it has not completed its deliberations (expected by the end of the year), although other educational areas were addressed. Again, we hope and expect that Jewish education initiatives, both formal, informal and throughout the family life cycle, will be implemented.

This brings us to the current status of the Task Force report. The report was presented to the Federation officers, of which I am one, on July 20. After a great deal of intense discussion, two motions were passed which effectively accepted the report and established a small implementation committee (to report back to the officers), acknowledging the urgency of the issues.

This committee reported back to the executive committee and officers of Federation on August 17, establishing in general the approach outlined in the report. The initial funding will not be taken from current projects or from designated funds. Coordination with the Federation's community planning and allocations committee will avoid potential conflict and duplication.

All this has not been achieved without intense discussion (and even negotiation) with the "establishment" (of which I am a part) and the "bureaucracy."

As I have said repeatedly — and once again in this article — in these times it is not "business as usual." I have been criticized by a few people for making these remarks.

Unlike my acceptance of the comments regarding skepticism and the Israel connection, I completely reject the attitude that these are not urgent times requiring extraordinary attention and activity in all the communities of the Diaspora — emphasis on "in the communities" — as I believe this is where these issues can be addressed most effectively — in the trenches.

Some national organizations — the Council of Jewish Federations - U.S. Commission, for example — have in my opinion been totally ineffective and bureaucratic in this area. The biggest concerns we have to face are the unnecessary burdens and hinderances of bureaucracies, politics, divisiveness of turf and territory which stifle ideas and energy and alienate many of those whom we are trying to reach.

We must, all of us, move forward with renewed dedication and passion to maintain our current valued leadership and organizations, and to attract those who — with some justification, I believe — feel alienated and/or rejected.

Lastly, for those of you who have had the interest to read this article, but have not read the Task Force report, I urge you to call the Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto and ask for a few copies to share with your families and friends.

Discuss all or parts of it, even criticize it, but talk about it. We hope that discussion of the issues it raises, and those that evolve, will strengthen each of us, our families, our community, our people and all of humanity.

Bubbie helped me rediscover my Jewish roots

By MARCY GOLDMAN
Special to The CJN

Sadly, but not unalterably, I came a little late to my Jewish roots.

My parents had decided that organized religion held little appeal for them. They were unusual people; my mother, in her quest for universality, kept a warm and heimish home, but one wherein Jewish customs went by the wayside. My father disliked anything that had a label, and staunchly maintained that all groups — Jewish, Catholic, most clubs and fraternities — were all indeed one sort of segregation or another, since each included or excluded on an arbitrary basis.

I rarely went to shul as a child and sadly, when I did, all my peers, and even some adults, expressed incredulity at my presence. I could have come from another planet.

I experienced Passover on a regular basis through the gracious invitations of my aunt, who made sure all were welcome at her Seder table. My only Hebrew words were Shalom and my own name, Marcia, after Moses.

But when I was eight, my life changed a little. My grandmother, who was blind, came to live with us.

Getting used to sharing my room with her was no problem. I was just young enough to be delighted to have a roommate — and one who never tired of my after-school chatter at that.

More traditional than anyone else in my experience, and truly spiritual, she was a strong influence in my life — only it took me 30 years to figure this out.

Although my grandmother was generally a most undemanding, peaceful sort, she insisted that I light her Sabbath candles — a poignant, pathetic gesture between a blind bubbie and a reluctant granddaughter. I would watch her intone the prayer in this house of seafood-eaters, her see-nothing eyes gazing into history.

"Marcy," she would ask gently, "please point me toward the light."

I would oblige, gently holding her shoulders and pivoting her slowly to face the solid brass candlesticks. We were usually alone — no other adult even to ask why I was allowed to light matches unsupervised, although divinely blessed, no doubt.

She sang the blessing — I had no idea what she was saying, but in spite of myself, I found her mystic; and in spite of her blindness, I knew she had a unique vision, but one I was not yet ready to share.

Sometimes she said, despite her blindness, she could just barely make out two pinpoints of light, the flicker of the two candles as they glowed.

My grandmother has been gone some time and it is a lifetime ago since I was a granddaughter. In these parts I'm known as "Mom" — big time. But the intervening years had an effect — proof that time is not just quantitative.

Just to let you know, Bubbie, I came back.

Now a parent of my own three sons, I have made a decision not to live on the outside of Judaism but to approach the inner side. And each year, I layer on another coat of my own Jewishness. I no longer pick apples on Rosh Hashanah or mark other holy days simply by baking a larger brisket. We no longer gear up on Friday nights, we quiet down.

There are Hebrew lessons to drive to, raisin challahs to be pummelled and baked, Jewish history and stories to read to myself and my kids, a sukkah to build during the nippy, drizzly days of October, and a host of people, my community, to meet at shul and pray with, and with whom to exchange heartfelt, holiday sentiments.

It is not easy finding your way back to your heritage. And like many other slightly marginal Jews of my generation, I feel awkward with my lack of knowledge of shul protocol, Jewish rituals, and the Hebrew language itself.

I fumble even as my young sons are certain I am guiding them on a well-charted course. Sometimes I almost give in to my feelings of discomfort and stray from mainstream Jewish events and activities.

But then I think: is my discomfort sufficient to forfeit yet another generation? Can I look my sons in the eye as the years roll by, and excuse myself from denying them the basic Judaic traditions simply by saying I was never the religious type? I figure they can always reject things later on. But it is easier to divest yourself of extra baggage than load up on what you're missing at a later date.

So I sit in shul and sometimes squirm, trying to find patterns in prayers and songs that alternately elude and mesmerize me. But I take heart that my sons are blandly comfortable and my eldest kindly points out to me where we are in the prayer book — beaming with his mastery of the simple Hebrew words. I see a black and white blur on the page — he sees letters that make up words that have a meaning.

I take heart that often, another synagogue member will whisper what page we are on and guide me, as I guided my grandmother, towards some sort of light.

What comforts me is the realization finally that, while one needn't be religious to be spiritual, a little ritual is necessary to modern living.

At our home on Fridays my husband strives to come home early, the candles are lit, the kippahs are on, and all is (relatively) serene. And I think of my grandmother and my days as her resistant lighter of the Sabbath tapers.

Bubbie, I wish you could see us now — how you would adore my boys and they you. How gratified you would be to know I am no longer a reluctant outsider but clumsily attempting to be a full participant in the whole tapestry.

But I am sure the scent of the fresh baked challah finds its way to paradise and sometimes it seems the candles are extra bright.

And I know wherever you are, I would no longer have to turn you toward the light.

Palestinians take control over civilian affairs

Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM — Pressing forward with the next phase of the Israeli-Palestinian peace initiative, the Israeli Cabinet has unanimously ratified an agreement that transfers control over civilian affairs to Palestinians throughout the West Bank.

The Cabinet took the step despite calls from Israeli opposition leaders for the ministers to suspend the accord because of a terrorist attack within Israel's borders recently that left two Israelis dead.

The so-called "early empowerment" agreement, which was initialed last week by Israel and Palestinian authorities, provides for the transfer of control to the Palestinians over taxation, education, health, social welfare and tourism.

The timing for the implementation of the accord, which was approved August 27 by the Palestinian governing authority, still has to be worked out.

However, because of the start of the new school year on Sept. 1, control over education in the West Bank's seven school districts officially fell under Palestinian control last week.

The overall agreement was to be signed Monday, August 29 at the Erez checkpoint separating the Gaza Strip and Israel by the leaders of the two negotiating teams, Maj.-Gen. Danny Rothschild for Israel and his Palestinian counterpart, Nabil Sha'ath.

Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin and Palestine Liberation Organization chairman Yasser Arafat had originally been scheduled to sign the accord at Erez. It was unclear whether the terrorist attack near Tel Aviv on August 26 was responsible for the change.

In that incident, Shlomo Kepach, 22, of Holon, and his friend Gil Revah, 21, of Bat Yam, were found with their throats slashed at a construction site in Ramle, where they were working on the installation of an elevator for a new five-story building.

A search began for the two when their families grew concerned that the men had not returned home from work at the usual hour. Police were summoned to the construction site after a foreman found the two bodies lying in pools of blood on the fourth and fifth stories of the newly constructed building.

Police found a blood-stained knife as well as a pack of cigarettes that had the word "Hamas" inscribed on it.

Members of the Islamic fundamentalist Hamas movement later claimed responsibility for the attack, saying it was the third of five attacks planned in reprisal for the Feb. 25 Hebron massacre.

In its statement, Hamas said it would strike two more times before the end of the year.

However PLO Chairman Yasser Arafat said last Sunday that the two Israelis murdered in Ramle were apparent victims of a labor dispute, not a politically motivated terror attack.

"As I have been informed it was a confrontation between the two workers and the owners of the work. It escalated and they have done this crime ... It was not a military operation at all ... They escaped, we don't know where they are," Arafat told Reuters.

Arafat's surprising statement angered Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin who called it "sheer nonsense." It ignored the Hamas claim of responsibility for the attack. Israeli police say they know the identity of the five Palestinian workers.

The August 26 attack was the first on a target within Israel since the implementation of Palestinian self-rule in Gaza and the West Bank enclave of Jericho in mid-May.

Police officials said no arrests were made, but that they suspected the murders were carried out by Palestinian workers.

Police subsequently staged a nationwide sweep for Palestinians working within Israel without government-issued work permits.

According to police officials, more than 200 Palestinians without permits were detained. The police said their Israeli employers, who reap the financial benefits of hiring the low-paid workers, would be subject to heavy fines.

Following the murders, a group of angry Ramle residents gathered in the streets, where they burned tires, threw rocks at police, shouted anti-government slogans and pledged vengeance.

According to the police, 23 Israelis were arrested during the Ramle riots.

Residents of Holon and Bat Yam, the hometowns of the two victims, also held angry demonstrations.

The slain men were buried in the Holon cemetery on August 28.

Israeli opposition leaders called on the government to seal off the territories to prevent Palestinians from working within Israel, a measure taken several times in the past, following terrorist acts against Israelis.

But Rabin rejected calls to impose another closure on the territories. At the Cabinet meeting, he called instead for a crackdown on Israeli employers who offer work to illegal Palestinian workers.

Foreign Minister Shimon Peres, responding to right-wing calls for the government to suspend the early empowerment agreement, urged a more low-key response. He said that terrorism could best be fought by improving the living conditions of Palestinians.

"There are those who believe we can shoot at Hamas with cannons or with guns and be done with them. We tried that route for many years with partial results," he told Army Radio. "In my opinion, the way to liquidate terrorism is by getting rid of the reasons for it, political and economic."

The agreement on early empowerment represents the second phase of the Israeli-Palestinian peace initiative outlined in the Palestinian self-rule accord signed last September in Washington. The first phase took place in May, with the granting of Palestinian autonomy in Gaza and Jericho.

During a Cabinet meeting recess on August 28, Environment Minister Yossi Sarid said Israel had decided to go ahead with the latest agreement because it had already been initialed.

But he warned that if the Palestinian governing authority did not take steps to control violence against Israelis by Islamic militants, further phases of the peace process could be imperiled.

Sarid also said Israel was demanding that the Palestinian officials catch and hand over to Israel the militants responsible for last Friday's terrorist attack

UN body praises Mideast peace process; rejects anti-Israel resolution

Jewish Telegraphic Agency

GENEVA — The UN Human Rights Commission has passed a resolution praising progress in the Middle East peace process and calling on all UN member states to extend economic assistance to the three-month-old Palestinian governing authority.

At the same time, the 53-member commission rejected a second resolution that condemned Israel for committing human rights abuses in the administered territories.

It marked the first time since 1968 that Israel was not condemned for its practices in the territories.

The second resolution had been sponsored by Syria, Lebanon and Cuba.

"They have been given a lesson that their negative attitude (toward Israel) is no longer accepted," Yitzhak Lior, the Israeli ambassador to the UN in Geneva, said in reaction to the defeated resolution.

"Israel is no more on the defensive at UN forums," said an American delegate.

Explaining the defeat, delegates to the commission said that African states are no longer willing to back Syria's anti-Israel positions and that instead they are siding with Israel in the hope that Jerusalem will be more helpful to them in the future than Damascus.

Which brings me to yet another flaw, as I see it: the failure of the task force to identify the spiritual search of our time and to urge community support for those who seek to meet it. Perhaps if teachers of Judaism, even rabbis, had been allowed to sit on the task force, its scope would have been both more broad and more accurate. It would have acknowledged that the synagogue, for all the criticism by Jews who don't wish to pay dues, remains the single most effective institution in the service of Jewish continuity.

Even without the benefit of clergy, though, the task force has produced a good report — as far as it goes. But it does not go far enough. By insulating the local community from the larger context of Diaspora and Israel; by failing to put forward far-reaching proposals that could meet head-on the vexing issues of our time; and by sidestepping the deep spiritual and intellectual challenges before us, it has lost the opportunity to say something significant and to seek to bring us together for a common purpose.

The result, therefore, does not seem to be much more than status quo plus yet another committee. The fact that there aren't any solutions — a fact admitted by the chair of the report in his covering letter — is not a good enough reason to restrain imagination and to be satisfied with the obvious.

By RABBI BARUCH FRYDMAN-KOHL

The historian Simon Rawidowicz, in an essay entitled, Israel: The Ever-Dying People, contended that "There was hardly a generation in the Diaspora that did not consider itself the final link in Israel's chain. Each always saw before it the abyss ready to swallow it up." Yet somehow, the situation today seems different and more urgent.

We arrived at this point as the result of a long process. The historian Jacob Katz describes the period between 1770 and 1870 as a time in which "Jewish communities underwent a transformation that changed their legal status, their occupational distribution, their cultural habits, as well as their religious outlook and behavior." By the end of the 19th century, Jews had made political gains and undergone cultural shifts, but still remained a separate people. As Katz notes, "Jews entered European society but did not merge with it."

But the pace of change accelerated in the 20th century. Seventy-five years ago, the German-Jewish philosopher, Franz Rosenzweig, said the Jew no longer needed to return home at dusk, but "finds his spiritual and intellectual home outside the Jewish world."

The 1990 National U.S. Jewish Population Survey drew a gloomy picture of intermarriage rates, conversion out of our community and increased apathy and ignorance amongst many who do consider themselves Jews.

In response, Jewish federations around North America have established commissions on Jewish education and continuity which are recirculating many recommendations first suggested by the former Institute for Jewish Life of the early 1970s.

The Israeli and Diaspora political leadership are calling for increased opportunities for teenagers to visit Israel. Informal and whole family education is advocated as an effective strategy for "opening up" the joys of Jewish life to the many disaffected.

While this burst of activity and programming is all to the good, we must acknowledge that Jewish indentification is both profoundly personal and determined by many factors, most of which are beyond our control. Moreover, all of these efforts are predicated upon a satisfactory answer to a question which is often not articulated publicly, yet which constitutes the heart of contemporary dialogue between parents and children. Dennis Prager writes that it is "by far the most important question facing the Jewish people today" — Why be Jewish?

This appears to be a new question on the table of the Jewish community. Until recently, we answered functional questions of how to be Jewish, such as "Am I allowed to attend a wedding during the month after my mother's death?" or "What should I do to make my house kosher?" We are used to explaining about our history, politics or culture. But, as Barry Holtz contends, in an essay which has inspired this meditation, in an open environment, against tremendous cultural competition, we must now be prepared to make the case for why being Jewish is of ultimate concern.

On Rosh Hashanah, we read of the birth of Issac after many years of unfulfilled hopes. We also read of the Aggadah, the almost-sacrifice of that same child. Perhaps, in the selection by our Sages of those narratives for review during the Day of Remembrance and Judgement, we may find some suggestions as to how to respond to our modern concerns.

First of all, Abraham and Sarah exhibit trust in God. They follow the Holy One to a land they do not know; Abraham brings their son to a mountain he has not yet seen. The first reason for being Jewish is belief: follow God in faith that the Holy One has a plan and a destiny for me. Out of this comes a vision of holiness and a sense of being commanded.

We are told by the Torah that when Abraham and Sarah left Haran, they departed with "the souls they made" there. They left with others and ultimately became the ancestors of a family which would preserve the convenant as a privilege. The second reason for being Jewish is belonging: being part of a community of memory and meaning in a world where multiculturalism actually serves to obscure the communal connections which add meaning to my life.

When the three visitors to Abraham's tent leave after the prophecy that "next year at this time, Sarah will have a son," two of them go on to Sodom, where they attempt to extricate Lot from an environment of violence and immortality. They want Lot to join an encompassing civilization with ideals and behaviors not doomed to destruction. The third reason for being Jewish is to be part of a culture and civilization which has a paideia, a holistic vision of "the good life."

God promises Abraham that he will become the ancestor of a people which will be a blessing to all the people of the earth. The fourth reason for being Jewish is that we are Abraham's children and we have a proud and distinguished history which should be preserved by our living presence. Moreover, the ethical teachings of our Torah require us to enter the larger world and work to bring about a society and planet which is fit to become the Dominion of God. We are called upon to be a commonwealth of priests and a holy nation so that we can be a blessing to others.

Another reason for being Jewish is that our work is incomplete. As a part of that commitment to a better world, we are also linked to the State of Israel in its dream to be a "light to the nations" and by its efforts to uplift the Jewish people in our homeland and throughout the Diaspora.

Finally, after all his difficult experiences, Abraham comes to Moriah, the mountain where God is seen. Judaism provides wise guidance to us in our quest to make sense of our lives. Our sacred texts — the Torah, Talmud and later writings and commentaries — speak with tremendous insight to the challenges we face in contemporary life. Our ritual life — the Days of Awe, the Shabbat Queen, the Royal Table — gives us a way of living which enables us to pass on morality, wisdom and ethics to our children. Our tradition teaches us not only about how to be "in the world," but also how to cultivate the inwardness which is necessary for being with God. We should be Jewish because the way of Torah is a path of deep and profound authenticity which helps us to make sense of our lives, teach our children a joyous way of life, and lead us to experience the presence of God.

As "members of the tribe" we must begin to articulate to each other, our children and our grandchildren why we are Jewish. We must tell our personal stories and histories in ways that, until now, we may have been reluctant to share. As Joan Didion, the writer, once observed, "We tell ourselves stories that we might live."

Abraham and Sarah had no historical tradition to draw upon to justify their path away from Haran. They no doubt revealed their spiritual insights and experiences to others. They aspired to be like the stars of heaven. We are blessed with the record of their encounters as well as the stories and traditions of subsequent generations.

Continuity depends on a living Judaism anchored by strong family traditions, good education and innovative programming. But it must be nourished by fidelity and hope. It is time to tell our stories — of our past and of our anticipated future — so that our people will continue to flourish and shine like the stars in the sky.

May we all be blessed with a year of good health, personal happiness, peace for Israel and the world, and long life.

Rabbi Frydman-Kohl is the spiritual leader of Beth Tzedec Congregation.

Recess. The thought of it is enough to make most kids' clothes fall apart at the seams. But not at Roots. Because at Roots we never cut corners. Never. All of our kids' clothes are hand-crafted right here in Canada, using only the finest heavy-weight natural fabrics, tight-knit, so they won't stretch or tear like lighter weight fabrics. And each piece is two-needle surge stitched for added durability. So you can put our clothes through the spin cycle again and again, without any fear of them falling apart. Roots clothing for kids. We make them as tough as we do, because kids are tough on their clothes.

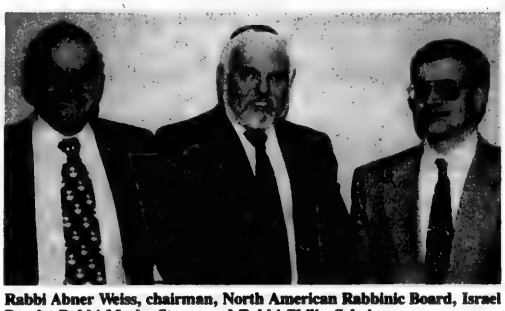
Israel Bonds rabbinic chair slams views of Yossi Beilin

TORONTO — The North American rabbinic chair for State of Israel Bonds has issued a vigorous counter-attack against the controversial views of Yossi Beilin, Israel's deputy foreign minister.

Beilin has repeatedly said Israel no longer needs financial assistance from the Diaspora.

Rabbi Abner Weiss, speaking last week in Toronto, called Beilin's comments "extraordinarily irresponsible." He said some of his U.S. colleagues are using Beilin's remarks to justify poorly planned or non-existent Israel Bond campaigns this year.



Rabbi Abner Weiss, chairman, North American Rabbinic Board, Israel Bonds; Rabbi Moshe Stern; and Rabbi Philip Scheim.

However, according to Rabbi Weiss, economic reality contradicts Beilin's assertions, and Bond dollars are required more than ever. He told a delegation of Toronto rabbis from all denominations that Israel will need $40 billion during the rest of this decade to absorb new immigrants. Twenty billion dollars will be Israel's responsibility alone. United States loan guarantees will account for another $10 billion, leaving a $10 billion gap which must be met by world Jewry.

"If there is a government in Israel that angers the United States, the loan guarantees will cease immediately," he said.

With the unemployment rate for new immigrants dropping from about 40 per cent to 13 per cent, the impact of Bond dollars, said Rabbi Weiss, is plain to see. Israel recently raised rates to as high as eight per cent on Bonds available in Canada.

"The government of the State of Israel is not stupid enough to be increasing interest on money loaned to it, if it doesn't need the money," Rabbi Weiss said.

Community reaches out to help Rwanda

TORONTO — The Jewish Community here is responding speedily and generously to an appeal for Rwanda relief funds.

Over $30,000 has been collected in two weeks, through a fundraising drive initiated by the Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto and the Canadian Jewish Congress, Ontario region (CJC).

"The Jewish community's response to the Rwandan tragedy attests to its compassion," said Gerda Friedberg, chair of CJC's Ontario region. "Our focus is to do our part in alleviating the suffering."

Local contributions are being sent to the American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee (JDC) in New York, which is coordinating the relief efforts of North American Jewry. The JDC, which was active in Somalia, is setting up an aid facility in Tanzania, for the victims of the Rwandan conflict.

Among the Toronto donations are more than 11,000 tablets of Ciproflaxicon, valued at about $20,000, from Miles Canada and Kohlers Distributing in Hamilton. Ciproflaxicon is the only medication that has proven itself effective against the many diseases from which the Rwandan refugees are suffering.

"The misery of Rwanda is not just an African tragedy. It's a global tragedy, and our Jewish community, thousands of miles from the front lines, is responding in a very special way," noted Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto president Bernie Ghert.

Cheques for the Rwanda campaign should be made out to United Jewish Welfare Fund: Rwanda Relief and mailed to Rwanda Relief Fund, 4600 Bathurst St., Willowdale, Ont., M2R 3V2.

Tradition

Paul Stern, President

I remember when I was very small, I used to sit in shul on Rosh Hashanah and Yom Kipper snuggled up to my Zaida. I'd listen to Kol Nidre mezmorized by the beauty of the words and the music. . .

And when it was time for the Shofar to sound, I'd close my eyes and puff out my cheeks and pretend that it was me blowing. . .

And there was nothing more delicious than my mother's chicken soup or my Aunt Clara's desserts.

You know it"s funny, after all these years, all the familiarity, I still look forward to Yom Tov with great excitment.

In this changing world
hold on to the things you can rely on

Whishing you and your family a very Happy, Healthy, Prosperous New Year.

Thank you for making us one of your family traditions.

The Honourable Gerry Weiner, Minister of Multiculturalism and Citizenship; Professor Irving Abella; York President Susan Mann; Gail Guthrie Valaskakis, Dean, Faculty of Arts and Science, Concordia University.

York's programs in Jewish Studies offer students a Bachelor of Arts degree or a combined Bachelor of Arts/Bachelor of Education degree.

York has offered Jewish Studies courses for over a quarter of a century. A Centre for Jewish Studies was established in 1989 for the purpose of opening up new areas of teaching and research, and to strengthen relationships with the Jewish community. In its brief existence, the Centre has done much to advance the teaching and study of Judaica at York. Recently, the University initiated a course in Sephardic Studies. In the coming year, new courses on Jewish Law, Judaism in Canada, and Canadian Jewish History will be offered.

Areas of focus within York's Centre for Jewish Studies include: Classical Jewish Learning; Teacher Education; the Jewish Community in Canada; Sephardic Culture; Canada-Israel Relations; Holocaust Studies; Contemporary and Medieval Jewish Thought; Jewish Communal Public Policy; Jewish Law; Jews in Film, Sports, Recreation and Leisure.

Exchanges and Cooperative Activities

These include:

- A joint agreement with the Hebrew University of Jerusalem for an exchange of students and faculty.
- A cooperative research and lecture agreement with the Jerusalem Institute for Public Affairs.
- A cooperative arrangement with the International Center for University Teaching of Jewish Civilization under the auspices of the President of Israel. A joint project between the International Center and York's Centre on the study of Jerusalem is under consideration.
- A joint research program in Canadian Jewish Studies with Concordia University in Montreal, funded through an endowment grant from the Ministry of Multiculturalism and Citizenship.
- Links with scholars and programs at universities in Canada, the United States, and Israel.

Wolinsky Lectures

The Leonard Wolinsky Lecture Series, which serves both the University and the general community, has focused on significant themes in Jewish life and, over the years, has hosted a number of outstanding scholars. In 1993, the series theme was Jewish resistance during the Holocaust. The 1994 lectures dealt with antisemitism and nationalism in commemoration of the 100th anniversary of the Dreyfus case. These Lectures have done much to strengthen the long-established connection between Jewish Studies at York and the Toronto Jewish community.

Sharp speaks out for united Canada

By FRANCES KRAFT
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Without French Canadian society, Canada would be a dull, smaller version of the United States, according to Mitchell Sharp, adviser to Prime Minister Jean Chretien.

Sharp, 83, was speaking at Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda Synagogue at the 75th anniversary dinner of Metro Toronto B'nai Brith Lodge. He delivered both a strong message of Canadian unity and advice on how to achieve it.

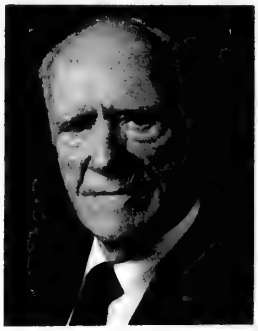
"The best way to promote the cause of unity is to demonstrate that while those who advocate separation are mistaken in their views, we regard them as fellow Canadians with whom we expect to be associated in citizenship for a long time," he said.

"I cringed when I heard some ignorant, narrow-minded Canadians say, 'Let them go. We'd be better off without them.' That kind of talk plays right into separatists' hands. They want to create the impression that English-speaking Canadians are intolerant."

Sharp credited the dual existence of Canada's English- and French-speaking societies with stimulating tolerance.

When the Winnipeg native first arrived in Ottawa in 1942 to work as an officer of the Department of Finance, there were no French Canadians in top public service jobs, he said.

Interestingly, at that time the dearth of French Canadians "wasn't particularly noticed," Sharp said. "That just seemed to be the way it was." Today almost one-third of the top jobs are filled by French Canadians, he said.



Mitchell Sharp

Sharp surmised that the Jewish community might have "a better understanding" of the Quebec situation than other groups, given that both Jewish and French communities have struggled to retain a culture.

The veteran politician, a former Minister of Finance and Toronto-area MP in the 1960s, is optimistic about the future of Canada, he said. His optimism is based on the flexibility of the Canadian constitution and his belief that most Canadians love Canada even though we don't "parade our patriotism."

Sharp also spoke briefly about Israel, expressing the hope that "the spirit of B'nai Brith — people helping people — will prevail in the negotations with the Palestinians, the Jordanians and hopefully the Syrians."

Sharp was introduced and thanked by lodge member Charles Chaplin.

The celebratory evening, attended by close to 180 people, marked 75 years of a B'nai Brith lodge presence in Toronto. The original Toronto lodge was the only one in Toronto for over two decades. The late Nathan Phillips, who was to become a mayor of Toronto, was its president in the early 1920s.

By the 1940s, lodge membership had grown to over 800, and groups broke off to form new lodges. Metro Toronto lodge includes four of those lodges — Empire, Forest Hill, Eglinton and Sportsmen's — which merged again with the original lodge over the past decade.

Metro Toronto Lodge has a strong history of community involvement. It has "nurtured and helped hundreds of charities," said emcee Murray Ehrlick. The lodge lends annual financial support to almost three dozen organizations, including the Jewish National Fund, Baycrest Centre, the Salvation Army, Canadian Cancer Society, Tel Aviv University and the Magen David Adom.

The original lodges which now comprise Metro Toronto Lodge have "contributed to a page in the history of Canadian Jewry," said Brian Morris, president of B'nai Brith Canada (BBC). "You have passed on a torch which burns even more brightly today."

Frank Dimant, BBC executive vice-president, reflected on the historic events witnessed by lodge members over the years and spoke of Jewish unity in the wake of recent terrorist attacks on Jewish targets.

Lodge president Allen Feig spoke of Jews being brought together by the early calendar date of Rosh Hashanah this year as well as by recent incidences of anti-Semitic terrorism. B'nai Brith brings Jews together on a year-round basis. "If we act together as Jews, we will survive as Jews," he said.

Twelve lodge members were honored in a candlelighting ceremony. Harvey Borden, a past president of two constituent lodges, paid tribute to past presidents.

Lodge member Jack Constant recited the motzi and read a prayer for peace which he had composed.

North York appoints Yaffe chief medical officer of health

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Dr. Barbara Yaffe was recently appointed the medical officer of health for North York by order of City Council.

Yaffe, a North York resident and mother of two young children, ages 4 and 6, has served as an associate medical officer of health in the City of Toronto Public Health Department for the last seven years.

She says, "The Public Health Department at North York has an excellent reputation . . . with its teaching health unit, research teams and excellent staff. It is known as a centre of excellence and I feel I can contribute in a meaningful way to the department."

The 39-year-old North York resident has been actively involved with the Greater Toronto Area Medical Officers of Health group, where she served on several committees including communicable disease control, TB policy and health promotion. Last year, she spent six months working on streamlining Toronto's public health department.

Yaffe told The CJN that the mission of the North York Public Health Department is to improve the health of people in the City of North York through health promotion, disease prevention and health protection.

"Planning and working with the community, we anticipate, identify and respond to community health needs. We are a teaching health unit in partnership with the Ontario Ministry of Health and the University of Toronto. Thus, education and research are integrated to our operation."

The programs and services in the department are mandated under the Health Protection and Promotion Act.

As North York's commissioner and medical officer of health, Yaffe heads a staff of 280 professionals.

"I am responsible to the board for the management and administration of the mandated programs and services," she says. "My job involves health planning; policy development; consulting internally and externally to hospitals, physicians, community agencies and groups; research; and teaching."

Getting a minyan on the Danforth should be easier than finding one in the North, says Simcha Jacobovici, seen here dovening in the Eastern Arctic.

Minyan organized in Danforth area

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Things are changing in the Riverdale/Danforth area of Toronto. For the first time, a minyan has been organized and Jewish residents in that section of the city will have High Holy Day services as well as services throughout the year.

Over the years, a few Jewish businesses have been found in the area. Nevertheless, there has never been a deeply rooted Jewish community. The neighborhood does, however, have two of Canada's oldest Jewish cemeteries, on Jones Avenue and on Pape Avenue.

"Recently, many Jews, primarily from the arts, have moved into the area," says Israeli-born Canadian documentary director, Simcha Jacobovici, who lives in the neighborhood with his wife Nicole and 6-month-old daughter Ziva Esther.

Jacobovici explains that until recently, those who attended services on High Holy Days or at other times, would drive to a shul in the north. "Now a small group of us has started a weekly minyan in my house."

Through a mailing and by word-of-mouth, the news has spread that a minyan had been formed in the east end.

Jacobovici says, "We meet every Shabbat, perform the service, have the best kiddush in town, and then study the parshah while the children play and run around."

Jacobovici says, "It is our intent, once the core group has grown, to move into more permanent facilities and start a full-fledged shul." He notes that the group would be pleased to have others join the fledgling group for a minyan or for the High Holy Day services.

The High Holy Day services for Rosh Hashanah and Yom Kippur will be held in the area for the first time, and it seems fitting, given the ethnic makeup of the neighborhood, that the services will be held in the Athenian Garden Restaurant on Danforth Avenue, says Jacobovici.

Greek owner grew up with Jews

"The owner is a Greek and he grew up with Jews prior to the Holocaust in a small village near Salonica, which was a major Sephardic Jewish community prior to the war. He was delighted to make one of the rooms available to our minyan for the holidays."

He notes that Aish HaTorah will provide a sefer Torah and a rabbi for the High Holy Days.

For more information about the Riverdale minyan, call Simcha Jacobovici, (416) 422-1270 or fac (416) 422-4678.

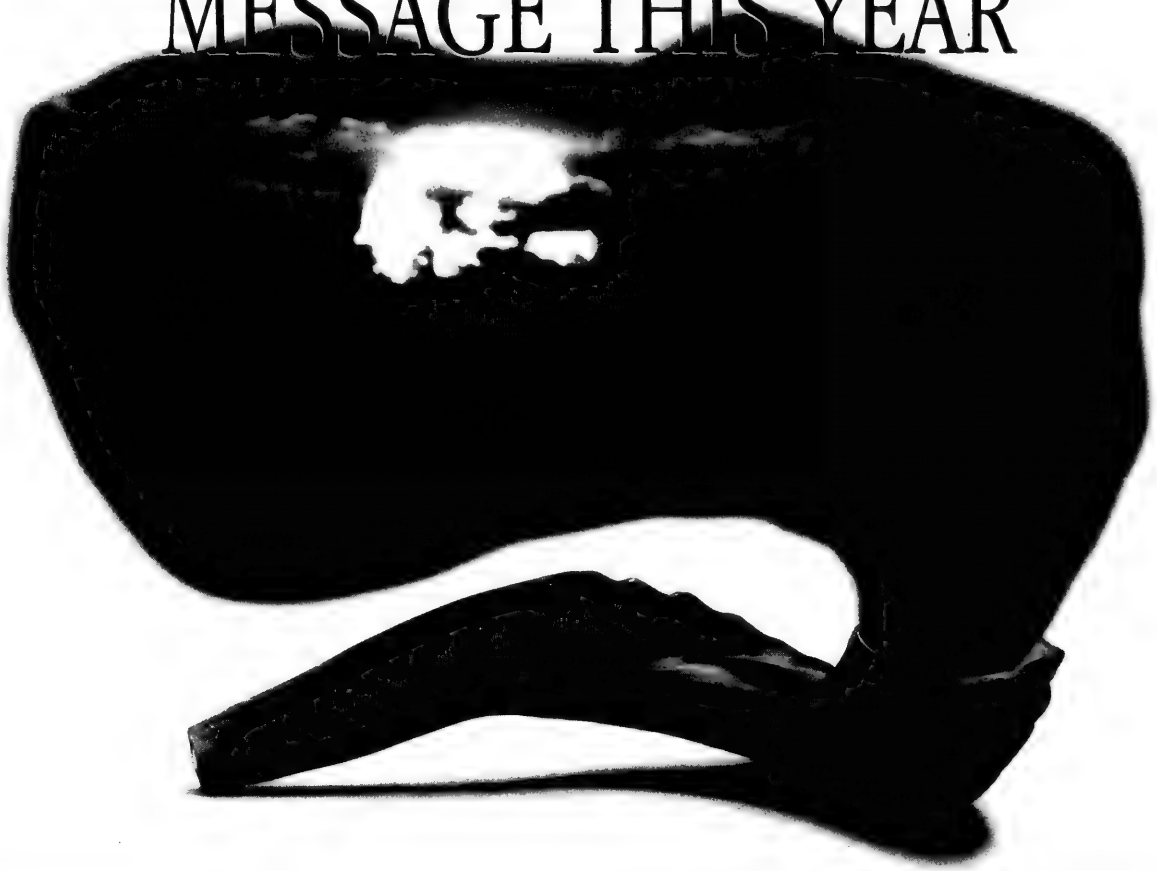
LISTEN VERY CAREFULLY AND YOU'LL HEAR A WONDERFUL MESSAGE THIS YEAR



A message of hope. A message of unity. A message of redemption.

"And on that day, the great shofar will be sounded, and the lost...and the forlorn...will come..."
High Holiday Prayer Book

A New Consciousness is Emerging.

We used to believe it's best not to get involved, today our intolerance for human suffering and injustice compels us to respond with refreshing boldness. These are the sensibilities of a new era. The age when goodness, peace and G-dliness is becoming an integral part of our lives:
The Age of Mashiach.

With our sincere prayers and additional good deeds, we can coax the world into the imminent complete Redemption. As the Lubavicher Rebbe declared:

"Mashiach is about to come. Let us prepare by increasing in deeds of goodness and kindness."

May our New Year Resolutions reflect the New Era not just the New Year.

Here's some suggestions:

- Forgive an old grudge
- Make that call to your parents
- Make a daily habit of giving charity*
- Recite a daily prayer
- Join a Torah study group
- Explore the texts dealing with Mashiach and Redemption
- Light Shabbat and Holiday candles, and celebrate these days with your family
- Enrol your Jewish child in a Jewish school

*Except for Shabbat and Jewish holidays.

Branson seeks funds for needed CAT scanner

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

Bert Raphael

TORONTO — North York Branson Hospital serves many people in the Jewish community of Metro.

To provide better and more efficient service to its patients, Branson needed a CAT scanner and other new equipment, as well as renovations to the east wing of the hospital, says Bert Raphael, chair of the hospital's Partners in Health fundraising campaign.

The campaign, with a goal of $2 million, is well under way, says Raphael, a senior partner in the law firm, Paroian, Raphael, Courey, Cohen & Houston, who has been active for years in many community activities.

"We are pleased that the CAT scanner is now installed, a new chronic ventilation unit is operational, an intermediate care unit has been completed and is operational, and other significant renovations are in progress," says Raphael.

"These recent acquisitions and renovations were required to bring our quality of care up to the high standards the hospital set when it was founded in 1957 by the Seventh Day Adventists."

Until recently, patients requiring CAT Scans were sent to neighboring hospitals for this service.

Rapahael told The CJN that "a vast number of patients — some 3,500, more than one in four patients plus emergency patients — are Jewish. Many of them are quite elderly and live in the Bathurst Street corridor."

The Jewish community is characterized by a population that is aging more rapidly than the provincial average and it has one of the highest older adult ratios in the city. It is well documented that aging and an increased need for health care services are related.

He notes that the hospital makes kosher meals available. Branson, which has many Jewish doctors on its staff, offers a wide range of medical services for both inpatients and outpatients of North York and beyond.

He adds that he is pleased that the Jewish community is well represented on the hospital's board of directors, whose members include Harley Mintz and Norman Gardiner.

Raphael explains that in these difficult times of government restraint hospitals look to private donors to make up the financial shortfall and provide the quality of service that people need and expect.

Branson Hospital was the first active-treatment fully-accredited public general hospital to be established in North York. For almost four decades, the hospital has continued to keep up with advances in medical services through modernization of facilities and the introduction of upgraded programs and equipment.

Raphael, who was the honoree in the Legal and Accountants Division of the State of Israel Bonds, also serves as legal counsel to the Canadian Jewish Congress national committee for Soviet Jewry and the Reena Foundation. He has received many tributes for his voluntary activities in the Jewish community, including work for the United Jewish Appeal, for the apprehension of Nazi war criminals, and in the field human rights.

Raphael says he accepted the chair of the Partners in Health campaign "because I felt that there was an obligation in the Jewish community to repay North York Branson Hospital for the services it has rendered."

He appeals to the entire Jewish community, particularly those living in North York, to contribute to the hospital's campaign "since they and their friends and relatives are the ultimate beneficiaries of a first-rate hospital facility."

Branson has been the busiest transfer site in Metropolitan Toronto by a wide margin, notes Raphael. It also ranks as a CAT referral leader across the province. This referral rate reflects the extremely active North York Branson Hospital patient programs.

"Considering the generous support we received in the past," says Raphael, "the hospital is confident of reaching its goal and achieving the upgrade required to meet the health care needs of the community it serves."

Anyone interested in supporting the Partners in Health campaign or to donate a piece of equipment to the Branson Hospital, please call Bert Raphael, (416) 594-1812 or fax (416) 594-0668.

Rabbi Emanuel Carlebach of the House of Israel Synagogue in Ste. Agathe, Quebec carries the new sefer Torah donated to the shul by Lily Bass on its journey across Lac des Sables. Sefer Torah goes down the lake

By JANICE ARNOLD
CJN Staff Reporter

STE. AGATHE — It's a sight country-cottagers whiling away a summery Sunday around the lake are not likely to soon forget.

A wide-bodied pontoon sped down Lac des Sables with a bearded young rabbi in a long black coat standing in front holding high a sefer Torah, its silver crown glinting in the sun, waving as he went by.

On board, others, including Montreal Chief Rabbi Pinchus Hirschprung, danced and sang as the boat, decorated with a large Israeli flag and blue and white balloons made its way across the lake to the House of Israel Synagogue.

Behind followed over 30 motor boats of all shapes and sizes — from little skittering Sea-doos to hulking barges — forming a flotilla escort.

The occasion was the dedication of a new Torah scroll donated to the congregation by Lily Bass and her family in memory of her husband Louis Bass, who passed away about a year ago. The scroll, whose monetary value is about $40,000 (U.S.), was handwritten in Israel and was flown to Montreal, sitting in a first-class seat on El Al Airlines beside Lily Bass.

To complete the image of travel by air, land and sea, the congregation, led by Rabbi Emanuel Carlebach, an energetic young Lubavitcher, hit upon the idea of taking the scroll out on the picturesque, mountain-ringed lake for the mile or so trip from the Bass home to the synagogue.

As is customary, a few letters of the Torah remained unfinished. The completion took place back on the verandah of the Bass residence, under the watchful eye of scribe, Rabbi Ephraim Shmuckler as dozens of people, most of them up from Montreal for the weekend, looked on.

From there, the scroll was carried under a white and gold-braid wedding chupah to the dock at the bottom of the yard and onto the pontoon with Rabbi Carlebach holding it aloft. A police officer on a Sea-doo led the procession.

"It was an amazing sight. I've been coming here for over 20 years and have never seen anything like it," said lawyer Irwin Liebman, chair of the event. "We've done some research and can't find anywhere else this has been done."

Scroll paraded through the crowd

The boaters were cottagers from around the lake, most of whom are affiliated with House of Israel, the only synagogue functioning year-round in Quebec, outside of Montreal and Quebec City. Built in 1953, the synagogue underwent a major renovation a couple of years ago and has about 800 members, mostly Montrealers with summer homes or skiers in winter, who represent the spectrum of Jewish denominations. At least 300 are expected for the High Holy Days.

The Basses are longtime members and owned a hotel in the area.

A motorcade of about 35 cars drove from the Bass home to the synagogue, and when the boats arrived about 200 people were on the shore waiting and making merry.

Many more joined in at the little synagogue, which overflowed with people on its steps and out onto the street. Police had their hands full keeping order between the ecstatic Torah parade and athletes running and cycling in a triathlon.

The new scroll, still under the chupah, was "greeted" by the House of Israel's other nine sifrei Torah, which were carried outside the synagogue. Rabbi Carlebach compares the sacred five books of Moses, which are believed to reveal G-d's will, to children. Both are so precious, he says, one can never have too many.

At the shul, the Torah was again joyously paraded through the crowd which had swelled to beyond capacity. Cantor Ya'acov Motzen of Adath Israel Congregation came from Montreal to conduct the service.

Rabbi Carlebach saw the event as particularly auspicious. Three days earlier, Bass' daughter Shanna Gomolin gave birth to a boy, the first grandchild. The infant witnessed the completion of the Torah from his pram on the verandah, while his mother spoke of the event as a memorial to her father and a celebration of life.

Holding back tears, Bass said she felt her late husband's presence, and another daughter, Heidi, in a d'var Torah, said the preservation of the Torah has allowed Jews to "transcend a tragic history."

Family, friends and shul officials symbolically assisted the scribe in completing a letter with a traditional white quill. A band played joyful songs.

As Heidi said, finishing just one letter is equivalent to the mitzvah of writing the entire work, in God's eyes.

Among those so honored was Shay Dubrofsky, former longtime president of the House of Israel, now well over age 90.

Then all the children under bar/bat mitzah age were invited to take part by Rabbi Carlebach as "guarantors of the Torah."

Women's yeshiva in Jerusalem is started by U.S. educator

By FRANCES KRAFT
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Holly Pavlov believes that love and support are key elements of success in any school. At She'arim College of Jewish Studies for Women, which Pavlov opened in the Har Nof area of Jerusalem this year, she herself is the key element in a multidimensional Jewish learning experience.

An American educator who made aliyah in 1983, Pavlov grew up in a "non-traditional" Jewish home in Philadelphia and decided at the age of 12 that she wanted to become observant.

Holly Pavlov

A graduate of New York's Stern College, Pavlov, 44, is the mother of seven children ranging in age from 7 to 22, and the grandmother of one. Her husband, Yossi, is an American-born psychologist.

Before opening She'arim, which caters to English-speaking women who have made a commitment to keep kosher and observe Shabbat, Pavlov spent 10 years as educational director of Midreshet Rachel, another women's Torah study institute in Israel.

Pavlov's intellectual standards, common sense and motherly concern all play a role in her educational philosophy. "When you teach, you teach the whole person. You can't separate the mind from the soul," she said in a recent interview in Toronto. The city was her only Canadian stop in a three-week North American fundraising and staff recruitment tour.

Pavlov demands both intellect and warmth from her teaching staff. "The teacher has to care deeply about the student on every level. I only hire staff who are interested in being involved with students beyond the classroom," she said.

The staff includes both women and men. Although Pavlov feels strongly about the benefits of learning in an all-female environment, she wants her students, many of whom are newly observant, "to see normal, healthy males and females [who are Orthodox]."

Because she believes that informal education is just as important as formal education, teachers must be willing to host She'arim students on Shabbat.

Pavlov wants to provide her students with a model of how to live "a normal family life" in a religious way instead of just presenting Judaism "in an idealized form" in the classroom.

As a ba'alat teshuvah (someone who has chosen to become observant) and a mother who understands how parents feel when their children choose a different lifestyle, she encourages students not to "throw away their past. We're not looking to cut the person off from their parents or their life. I feel a lot of empathy. Our experience is that people can use everything in their past."

Classes at She'arim in subjects such as Navi, Chumash and Halachah are run chevrusah-style, with women studying in pairs. Pavlov favors this "more creative, less passive" form of learning which she says fosters the ability to learn independently.

"This way the students won't always have to go to a lecture to learn. They will be able to learn by themselves," she said.

Students can attend She'arim for three months to a year. So far there are 25 part-time students. The institute will offer full-time classes beginning in October. Two levels of study will be offered at first. Pavlov plans to include more advanced studies in the future. A reading knowledge of Hebrew is a prerequisite.

Tuition for full-time classes is $4,000 (U.S.) per year, "but nobody is turned away on the basis of financial need," said Pavlov.

For further information about the school, contact Pavlov at She'arim College of Jewish Studies for Women, P.O. Box 35129, Jerusalem, Israel, or call 972-2-519-148.

Archeologist Jones discovers lost home of first mishkan

By DAVID BEGOUN AND KEVIN UNGER
Special to The CJN

"And the nation ascended from the Jordan on the 10th day of the first month and encamped at Gilgal on the eastern side of the Jericho." (Joshua 4:19).

Archeologist Vendyl Jones, has stumbled into a wall, only this one he is convinced is the remains of the surrounding walls of the first mishkan (portable sanctuary) erected under Joshua's command at Gilgal.

Immediately upon crossing the Jordan River in the year 2488, the Israelites set up camp at Gilgal at the northern end of the Dead Sea. For the next fourteen years, the mishkan remained there while the Israelites slowly conquered the tribes and cities in the Promised Land.

"The mishkan sat right over there. These are the lines we picked up by satellite in November 1993," said the veteran archeologist.

"The gate to the mishkan courtyard was right here," Jones said, pointing at his feet.

After gaining notoriety for his dicoveries of the kitorit (Temple incense) and a vial of shemen afarsimon (anointing oil) which were found at Qumram in 1988, Jones set out to find the mishkan at Gilgal.

With satellite photography and infrared detection systems, an unexplained rectangular shape was picked-up in the general vicinity which Jones had predetermined to be the biblical site of Gilgal.

Jones immediately compiled his team from family members, former diggers and volunteers who contributed private funds to join the dig.

Shortly after they broke ground, they determined that the dimensions of the wall were in precise ratio accordance with the dimensions of the outer courtyard of the mishkan laid out in the Book of Shemot, Chapter 27.

The outer courtyard, as described in Shemot, is 50 cubits by 100 cubits (most widely accepted to be 25 m x 50 m). The wall that Jones discovered — which he believes to be the outer mechitzah of the mishkan — also has a two to one ratio (63.5 m x 127 m), and a height of exactly one temple cubit (50 cm).

"Why would anyone build a wall only 50 cm high? This wouldn't serve a purpose for keeping any animals in or out. It wouldn't even keep out a rabbit," said the charismatic Jones after whom Steven Spielberg's Indiana Jones character was modeled.

One of most important in biblical history

In the convening tent of the team's headquarters in Kfar Adoumin, Jones — in a safari suit and crash helmet — overflowed with messianic enthusiasm as he described his project: "If this is what we believe it to be, it will be one of the most important finds in biblical history."

Slightly older and less chiseled than the dashing Indiana Jones as portrayed by Harrison Ford, the real Jones is a learned biblical scholar and historian in his own right.

If proven correct, Jones has discovered one of the single most important locations in all of Jewish history — the first Jewish capital in the Holy Land.

It was at Gilgal, immediately upon crossing the Jordan, that Joshua commanded the elders to construct the eternal 12 stone monument, with the entire Torah engraved on it, to testify to the miracles HaShem had performed. Later, the children of Israel were circumcised at Gilgal. Another four days passed before the first Pesach sacrifice in the Land was carried out, and the miraculous manna ceased.

For the next fourteen years the Israelites used Gilgal as the base from which they launched their conquering battles, including the famous battle of Jericho. Daily sacrifices and prayers were held in the courtyard of the mishkan which Jones claims to have found.

With infrared, thermal sensing techniques, which are capable of detecting a 3,000 year old footpath under 40 feet of rainforest and 15 feet of lava flow, Jones is hoping to find either impacted soil from the boards of the mishkan or continual foot traffic in and out of the courtyard.

"We're hoping to find the 12 stones which the Book of Joshua says are eternal. Then we'll see what the critics have to say," Jones said. To date, all that has been found aside from the walls, are pieces of pottery which Jones says date back to the 1300s BCE — the time of Joshua.

Although Jones and his team are confident that they have uncovered the ancient camp at Gilgal, they believe that only if HaShem wills the site of Gilgal to be uncovered, will their work be successful.

"All we can do is put in the effort, but ultimately it's in HaShem's hands," Jones confessed.

CJC helps campers learn about Israel

NIAGARA FALLS — Youngsters at Niagara Falls B'nai Jacob Camp this summer experienced a new way of learning about the geography of Israel.

They decorated an edible map of the country with dessert toppings brought to them by Canadian Jewish Congress, Ontario region (CJC).

The campers participated in the topographical design after looking over small maps of Israel given to them by CJC staff.

Using an outline of the country on bristol board covered with clear plastic wrap, the children, aged 4 to 10, decorated with chocolate syrup (rivers), coconut sprinkles (communities), chocolate chips (hills), ice cream (deserts) and other tasty edible toppings. Later, the youngsters joyfully ate their creations.

Rosalie Samosh, director of education and programming for 15 years at B'nai Jacob, lauded the CJC's hands-on, multi-media programs. "The annual visit from CJC staffers is always a highlight of our summer," she observed.

CJC, Ontario region has just completed two decades of providing Judaic content programs and resources to camps in the province. The coordinators of the 1994 program, Rachel Goodman and Lily Birimberg, devised this year's project with particular focus on Israel.

The coordinators both took part in the United Israel Appeal's March of the Living 1990 Mission to Poland and Israel, and spent a year in Israel after graduation from high school.

While on the march, the two met Susan Jackson, CJC Ontario region's Director of Community Services and Youth Activities, who supervises the camp program.

A graduate of Toronto's Ulpanat Orot, Lily Birimberg, 21, lived for 14 years in Israel, and is studying education at Touro College in New York City. Rachel Goodman, 21, recent recipient of a BA in psychology from Stern College for Women, is studying for a doctorate in clinical psychology at St. John's University in New York.

In May, the coordinators, assisted by Gaela Mintz, 14, a Grade 10 student at the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto, received an orientation on their work from Jackson and Randie Cartman, a CJC staffer who was the program coordinator two years ago. Subsequently, camps were contacted to enquire about program requirements and scheduling arrangements.

Camps other than B'nai Jacob assisted this year include: Jewish Community Centre day camps in Toronto, Hamilton, London and Windsor; Simcha, Kitchener; Lubavitch, Toronto; Kidsworld/Funworld, Toronto; and Or Hadash, Newmarket.

This year's menu for camps comprised programs on Israel, Shabbat and Bible heroes for children aged 3 to 5, and 6 to 9. The counsellors and campers seemed to respond most favorably to interactive Israel programs, observed the coordinators.

Tamara Gillier-Ciron, youth director for the Windsor Jewish Community Centre, praised the CJC coordinators "for really reaching out to our 100 campers, especially in their Israel programs emphasizing the past as well as the present-day peace process."

Our challenge was to program for camps and children with different levels of Jewish knowledge, explained the coordinators. They believe that the CJC project is especially important because it services some camps which have little Jewish content in their programming.

"The kids will remember that people came from Canadian Jewish Congress (and in some cases from another city) because CJC feels Jewish continuity and identity is important," said Goodman.

"We endeavored in our program to strengthen the campers' Jewish interest, and create a spark in them to further their knowledge."

The Case for Grandparent Rights and Responsibilities

In theory, any grandparent has the right to ask the Courts to grant him or her access to a grandchild, even if it is against the wishes of the biological parents. The courts usually have the power to grant custody or access to any person that is appropriate and on such terms that are in the child's best interests. However, many grandparents across the country are complaining that estranged spouses of their children with custody are frustrating proper or, sometimes, any access.

In many cases, such frustration cannot be prevented. On separation, ex-spouses often move to different places because of a new spouse or job opportunity, making access particularly cumbersome, with no one really to blame. However, in some cases, the custodial ex-spouse simply wants to sever all contact with her/his ex-spouse's parents, particularly if they themselves remarry and/or remarry into a different culture. ("Mr. Syrtash, can you believe she moved in with a "shagitz" and my grandchildren are now being raised" etc...) I have received several calls from grandparents who complain about some ex-daughter or son-in-law who makes access difficult. Conversely, I have received a similar number of calls from custodial parents who want their ex-in laws to leave them alone since "they were the ones who contributed to the marital split and are a horrible influence on my kids."

Many grandparents are now lobbying for legislation that would give them special or elevated statutory rights to access. If they succeed, is the right to ask child support from them by ex-daughters-in-law (or ex-sons-in-law) far behind, especially if they can afford to give such support?

In Quebec, grandparents already have a legal obligation to support their grandchildren. The courts in Quebec have acted to enforce such rights in the appropriate cases. However, in the rest of Canada, no such law exists, even if the grandparents had been subsidizing the family for several years. I've had at least a few cases where one of the spouses works (or receives a cheque for tax purposes) in "dad's business". Such a spouse often has only a modest position or earns no real salary. Dad buys a house for the couple (in Dad's name or with a hefty mortgage against the matrimonial home). Dad's business pays for all the expenses, i.e. much of the children's direct or indirect needs: private schools, designer clothing, Disneyworld, and furniture, etc.. But when the party's over, the Court cannot look to the grandparents as having any legal obligations.

The Court can assess the spouse's former lifestyle as an indicator as to his or her "real income". However, the Court looks primarily at the history of the actual receipt of revenue flowing directly to that spouse when assessing the ability to pay child support or a spouse's need for such support. Quite often, the result is that the Courts will disregard what a spouse received from his or her own parents when assessing the spouse's ability to pay or the spouse's real needs, notwithstanding the spouse's own parents' "former" generosity.

Partly for this reason, the living standards of children fall dramatically after separation, particularly when time with their grandchildren is suddenly reduced ("out of sight, out of mind?"). Conversely, where the custodial parent is receiving indirect support from Mom and Dad, some spouses who are paying support may be paying more than their share because "on paper", the custodial parent is earning less revenue than she is actually enjoying.

Shoppers steps into walkathon

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Shoppers Drug Mart will be competing with Harvey's and Swiss Chalet. But the drug store chain won't be dispensing french fries.

Shoppers Drug Mart and Dinnerex, the restaurant company that operates 23 Harvey's and 33 Swiss Chalet restaurants in Canada, will be competing in the Shoppers Walk for the Cure, a fundraiser for the Juvenile Diabetes Foundation (JDF).

At the kickoff for this event, David Bloom, Shoppers president, challenged Gabe Tsampalieros, president of Dinnerex, to match the number of participants on his team with the number walking for the Shoppers team.

The walk for JDF, the first of its kind in Canada, will take place at 9 a.m. on Sunday, Sept. 25, 1994 at Coronation Park on Lake Shore Boulevard. There will be both a 5K and a 10K route. Walk organizers would like participants to register by Sept. 14.

The walk is billed as a family event. There will be entertainment, prizes and a barbecue for participants and their families. CHFI announcer Sandy Hoyt will also be on hand as the honorary celebrity walk chair.

While Shoppers is the main corporate sponsor of this event, other companies like Harvey's, Blacks, and William M. Mercer will be donating supplies, services or prizes.

This event is modelled on the walks that have been taking place for the last five or six years in the United States, said Vince Brewerton, president of the Toronto chapter of the JDF of Canada.

"They're a great success ... in the cities that have them," he said.

Over one and a half million Canadians have been diagnosed with diabetes. About 150,000 of them have juvenile diabetes, which means they're insulin dependent. Complications from diabetes can lead to heart or kidney disease, and blindness.

There is common misconception that insulin is a cure, but it just maintains the disease "in a holding pattern," Bloom said in a brief speech at the kickoff.

"I want to be there on that day in five or 10 years, when I can say to people, 'Hand in your insulin it's no longer required, hand in your needle it's no longer required,' " he concluded.

Bloom has been raising money for JDF for the last 12 years. He became actively involved with the organization when Ryan Belitz, the son of one of Shoppers' senior executives, was diagnosed with juvenile diabetes. Last year he was a co-chair of the JDF gala.

The walk organizers want to get corporations to send out teams of employees. "It's not a costly event," said Bloom. "You're asking for their people not their money."

Since the kickoff, Bloom has sent letters to all of Shoppers major suppliers, such as Procter & Gamble, Lever Brothers and Coca Cola, challenging them to a fundraising competition at the walk.

"Will you meet us and can you beat us?" he wrote.

For more information about Shoppers Walk for the Cure call (416) 510-1350.

Baycrest leader honored

TORONTO — Tobie Bekhor, president of the Baycrest Women's Auxiliary and outstanding community volunteer, has received a Canada's Birthday Achievement Award.

Established by the Metropolitan Toronto and District Canada Day Committee 13 years ago as part of Canada Day celebrations, these awards serve to recognize the achievements of volunteers from many different fields, including geriatric, health care, humanitarian work and sports.

Each year, the number of recipients matches the age of the country so that in 1994, 127 people from an area bounded by Oshawa on the east and Niagara Falls on the west received awards. Recipients, representative of all ages and cultural groups, are chosen according to their records of achievement and their number of years of voluntary service.

Tobie Bekhor currently heads the Board of the Baycrest Women's Auxiliary, which has a community membership of 3,000 women.

The Auxiliary's activities focus on fundraising through annual events and the management of a gift shop and cafe; public relations and education through a speakers bureau and public health forum; and the provision of hands-on services such as welcome receptions, afternoon teas and sherry luncheons for Baycrest clients.

The next 12-week series begins Thursday, Sept. 22. Registration at 8:45 a.m. Classes are held at Holy Blossom Temple, Room 310, 9-10:30 a.m. and are suitable for women and men of all ages and yoga skill level.

SING WITH THE CHORALAIRS

The Choralairs of North York, a volunteer choir singing for seniors and the disabled, is looking for singers as it enters its 32nd year of service to the community. While voices in all ranges are always welcomed, especially needed are basses and tenors. Rehearsals are Tuesday evenings, 8:15-10:30, at Earl Bales Park Community Centre (Bathurst, south of Sheppard), Room 2, starting Sept. 13. There are no auditions and the ability to read music is not required, only an enjoyment of singing and a sense of humor! Repertoire includes pop, Broadway and folksongs.

Membership fees are $45 per person, $70 per couple with full tax receipt. These fees are necessary for the operation of the Choir as there is no admission charge for concerts. The Choir sings at homes for the aged and seniors' buildings every 4-5 weeks. For more information, Fay Cohen, 633-7233 or Mussey Eisner, 635-5566 or Harry Terrance, 633-0433.

IT'S A FAMILY AFFAIR!

It's fun for the whole family as United Way (UW) kicks off its annual fundraising campaign with the 12th annual Toronto Walks the United Way Walkathon. Help celebrate the International Year of the Family by bringing friends, family and loved ones to Nathan Phillips Square Sunday, Sept. 11, at 11:30 a.m. You'll have a "yabba dabba doo" good time as you join Fred, Wilma and the rest of the Flintstone gang from Bedrock, along with TV Ontario's Polkaroo on the Square for non-stop entertainment, refreshments and festivities. Pick up your pledge forms at Metro CIBC locations and participating Canada Post Outlets and support the United Way by collecting pledges for your 4-km walk. For information, call UW at 777-2001.

WHERE ARE YOU NOW?

In 1995 Norwood Child Care will be 200 years old, the oldest Jewish charity in the United Kingdom. Part of the celebrations will be a reunion of ex-residents of the orphanage and homes as well as an exhibition including memorabilia from the early Norwood days. The committee would like to know where you are so that an invitation to the celebrations can be sent to you. Also, any artifacts, photographs or other items of interest would be appreciated. Contact Sara Kyte, campaign director, Norwood Child Care, Norwood House, Harmony Way, London NW4 2BZ. Telephone 081 203 3030.

LIVING IN NORTH YORK

Distribution of the 1994/95 Living in North York publication to every household in North York was done August 23 and 24. SUMMER JOBS PROGRAM

BAYCREST'S CHAPLAINCY TRAINING PROGRAM

Starting this fall, Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care will be offering a unique chaplaincy training program to ordained clergy, people in religious vocations and interested lay persons who provide pastoral care in long-term care settings. This will be the first program of its kind offered by the Canadian Association of Pastoral Practice and Education in a Jewish institution, says Rabbi Norman Berlat, Baycrest's director of Pastoral Services. Rabbi Berlat explains that chaplains in hospitals and long-term care facilities help patients deal with illness and institutional life. As part of his certificate training, Rabbi Berlat (above, right) is currently supervising students such as Fran Klegerman, a palliative care volunteer at Mount Sinai Hospital, seen here talking with Baycrest resident Harry Bonza.

STROKE RECOVERY GROUP

Kicking up their heels at the Stroke Recovery Group's dinner/dance held at Adath Sholom Synagogue recently are Irene Lastman, dinner organizer and a longtime member of the group, and Vince Giamblanco. The Stroke Recovery Group meets at the Jewish Community Centre three times a week.

Bell Ewart cottagers mark 50 years in area

Interior of the Hebrew Centre of Bell Ewart dedicated in July of 1944.

LEFROY, Ont. — In the summer of 1944, a one-room wooden synagogue was commissioned by a small group of summer cottagers in the Bell Ewart area, a tiny community situated on the shores of Lake Simcoe some 80 kilometres north of Toronto.

Recently over 450 men, women and children attended a 50th anniversary celebration for the Hebrew Centre of Bell Ewart.

According to centre president Harry P. Botnick, the list of people who have spent a summer, or even part of a summer, in and around Bell Ewart reads like a who's who of the Toronto Jewish Community. "And," says Botnick, "practically every Jewish cottager in the area has been inside the Shul at least once."

Close to Toronto, Bell Ewart has always been a popular destination for summer cottagers. The viability of the synagogue and the presence of an eruv — a boundary which makes it permissible to carry on Shabbat — have contributed to the recent popularity of Bell Ewart among religious families.

From the end of June straight through until Labor Day, seating at the Bell Ewart synagogue is at a premium. Volunteer-run and -supported, the synagogue is also famous for its weekly kiddish inside the sanctuary immediately following services. Shloima Yunger, veteran chair of kiddish arrangements, laments that there simply are not enough weeks to accommodate the number of people who offer to host a Kiddish. "Believe me, it hurts to have to turn people down," she says.

The Hebrew Centre of Bell Ewart has a separate seating area for women and operates according to Orthodox tradition, yet the membership is diverse.

Rabbi Moishe Alon, a regular for the past 35 summers, says that for the most part, everybody gets along well. "But," he adds, "we are a great deal luckier than most other shuls because every year we have 44 weeks to forget all our disagreements. So no matter what happens in the course of a summer, we are happy to see one another come the next year!"

Event chair Howard Kleinberg points to a handful of people at the anniversary celebration who were present at the dedication 50 years ago. One is Rose Applebaum, who, together with her late husband Joe, were regulars until six years ago, shortly before Joe passed away. "My late husband and I attended synagogue every week in the city," she says, "yet somehow my fondest memories are tied up with this beautiful shul, and I really do have wonderful memories."

Kleinberg, who spoke briefly at a special synagogue seudah shlishit (third meal of Sabbath) the day before, made mention of the fact that he and wife Nancy were not present at the original dedication in July 1944. They were in Auschwitz at the time.

"It was a time in our lives when it was not possible to even dream of a place as tranquil and serene as Bell Ewart, much less imagine ourselves being there. What a privilege it is to be here," he said.

With the successful commemoration behind them, members of the Hebrew Centre of Bell Ewart are considering several improvement projects for the 50-year-old facility, which, sources say, is virtually unchanged from the day it opened.

One proposal is a plan to build an outdoor playground for the dozens of children who summer in the area. The playground would be dedicated in memory of the one million children who perished in the Holocaust.

Pride of Israel gets new spiritual leader

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Synagogues can serve as an oasis of peace in a sea of human turmoil says Rabbi Aaron Flanzraich, newly installed spiritual leader of Pride of Israel Synagogue.

"People are often dragged down by problems, and synagogues can be a source of stability in their otherwise hectic lives," he says.

Rabbi Flanzraich, born and raised in New York, attended the Yeshiva of Far Rockaway, New York and was granted ordination by Yeshiva Shaar Ephraim in Jerusalem and by the Israeli chief Rabbinate. Prior to his appointment at Pride of Israel, he was involved in his family's commercial printing business in New York and served as assistant rabbi at Sayville Jewish Centre.

Rabbi Flanzraich says that synagogues have a tremendous responsibility, particularly during a recession when the funding to community organizations is drastically reduced.

"It has fallen upon the synagogue to act as an umbrella for a variety of services," he said. "Those synagogues that survive, are the ones that fulfil that mission.

"Pride of Israel, located near Bathurst and Steeles in Willowdale, is in an area where there is a need for a traditional Conservative synagogue that can cater to families.

"To that end, we have begun a Shabbat story hour for children aged 3-8, have started a B'nai Brith Youth Organization chapter, have planned lectures and adult education programs; and we have a kosher food bank for those in need."

Rabbi Flanzraich, himself recently married, says that a number of young families belong to the synagogue but he is trying to attract more.

"Children need a proper set of goals and values so they can make choices in their life. What will they have with regards to morals and ethics if they have not been given a proper set of ideals and values?" he asks.

It saddens him that so many young people drift through life with no goals, filled with a deep void. "If the synagogue and the rabbi cannot fill that void, then who can?

"I think that part of the way rabbis can fill the void, is to be compassionate, friendly and approachable. The reality of our job is to be dedicated to helping the people in the community. I praise the Toronto Jewish community for having a number of exceptional rabbis. It seems that Toronto attracts the very best, and that is a wonderful reflection on the community."

Asked how one rabbi has the time to fulfil all his goals, Rabbi Flanzraich says that he knows things are going well when there is more to do than he can get done.

"Unless one always pushes themselves, they will never be challenged to be the very best they can be." he says.

"It is a wonderful challenge for me to try and get everything done that is important. I wake up in the morning energized to get to work. There is a tremendous amount of spiritual satisfaction in my job. It is very enlightening and it gives me the opportunity to become the best person I can possibly be."

North York guide available

NORTH YORK — The 24th annual guide to city services is now available to North York residents.

Living in North York contains a wide listing of community centres, hospitals, seniors centres, entertainment and city departments. Short descriptions, hours and phone numbers are included.

Ten Jewish institutions are listed, including the Koffler art gallery and the multilingual Bernard Betel Centre for Creative Living, where seniors can eat a hot kosher lunch five days a week.

Those who did not receive guides in the mail should contact the City of North York Information and Protocol Office at (416) 395-7300.

Singles bash leads BBC to rethink rental policy

By RON CSILLAG
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — B'nai Brith Canada has said it will reconsider its policy on which groups can rent space in its building, following an advertised singles dance hosted by a controversial group.

The Association of Independent Rabbis (AIR), composed of spiritual leaders whose credentials are questioned by established rabbinic groups in Toronto, touted an August 21 singles bash at BBC's 15 Hove St. headquarters.

The dance marked the first anniversary of the founding of AIR, which is headed by Rabbi Paul Sheldon.

Sheldon, 51, a self-proclaimed "freelance rabbi," for years has been a thorn in the side of Toronto's rabbinic community, mainly for his conversion classes and well-publicized willingness to officiate at any marriage.

In addition to Sheldon, other AIR members include rabbis Aaron Zimmerman, Harold Lerner and Zoltan Zagon. Their credentials have never been recognized either by the Toronto Board of Rabbis or the Vaad Harabanim.

BBC executive director Frank Dimant told The CJN he did not know about the contract with AIR "until after the fact."

He said his organization will reconsider its rental policy "so there shouldn't be any confusion as to the usage of space." Dimant said such rentals wouldn't be "fair to some of the tenants we have in this building, including a synagogue."

Paul Sheldon in cantorial garb in 1977.

Dimant said he had a few calls about the dance, "but even before I had a single call, when I was notified about the contract, I immediately put into place a meeting with representatives of AIR and tried to resolve the issue."

He said the dance was allowed to go ahead because it had been advertised, "but in the future we will reserve space for those organizations which aren't in conflict with tenants here or with our organization itself."

He said the contract with AIR was arranged "by someone here in the office."

The CJN was unable to reach Sheldon.

AIR executive director Brenda Dym explained he was out of town.

She said a "small group" attended the dance, but wouldn't give a rough estimate.

AIR was founded in the United States a year ago for the "70 per cent" of the Jewish community that is unaffiliated with a synagogue, she said.

Members provide "adoptions" [conversions] to Judaism, bar and bat mitzvah classes, hospital visits, marriages and gittin (Jewish divorce decrees), Dym said. She said AIR reaches out to those who cannot afford to join a synagogue.

AIR member Rabbi David Cooper said he knew nothing about the dance.

Zimmerman told The CJN he will resign from AIR "because of the way it's being operated," but declined further comment.

In a statement to The CJN, Rabbi Joseph Kelman of Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda Synagogue and a past president of the Toronto Board of Rabbis, said he was "very disturbed to note for the second time [that] B'nai Brith has been used by the group called the Association of Independent Rabbis.

"Unfortunately, this is the second time that B'nai Brith has assisted this group, the first being when their newspaper, the Tribune, [then the Covenant] published a long article [last November] about this questionable association. As a member of B'nai Brith, I do hope that B'nai Brith will reconsider its practice and stop being used as a party to give legitimacy to any Jewish group or activity that undermines the welfare of the entire Jewish community."

Continuity, education seen as top concerns in Hamilton

By MOURA WOLPERT
CJN Correspondent

HAMILTON — Jewish continuity and Jewish education emerged as the top priorities when community leaders, representatives of various organizations, teachers and other interested individuals met at the Jewish Community Centre (JCC) to discuss their hopes and concerns for the future of this community.

Called by the Jewish Federation of Hamilton-Wentworth and chaired by Ina Frank, this was, as Federation president, David Steinberg explained, "the first in a series of meetings to discuss and develop policies and priorities for this community."

Federation, Steinberg said, should not be perceived as just one organization amongst others but rather as "the catalyst to bring all organizations together to discuss community issues."

The two immediate problems facing the community are insufficient funding for Jewish education, and the future of the JCC.

Regarding the former, Steinberg announced that, in accordance with a recent resolution by Federation, monies raised by the forthcoming United Jewish Welfare Fund campaign "over and above last year's cash flow, will be divided equally between our educational beneficiaries . . . and Israel."

As for the JCC, "Jews are simply not utilizing the building," he said.

Steinberg indicated that two of the JCC's problems are a stalled application for zoning changes on the property, and their failure so far to have a bus route extended to the JCC.

However, "Federation is prepared to tolerate deficits on the property, if it is utilized in great numbers by the Jewish community. If it is not," said Steinberg, "we have to take steps to ensure that our community dollars are well spent."

That more funds will be allocated to Jewish education was welcome news for Dr. Judah Denburg, who pleaded eloquently for the establishment of "a non-denominational" Jewish high school.

Denburg is head of the immunology and allergy department of the McMaster University medical school and father of two sons; the elder is about to enter the public high school system after graduating from the Hamilton Hebrew Academy.

"This community has the ability to build and maintain, conceptually and financially, a Jewish community, non-denominational high school," said Denburg.

While the 3-year-old Yeshiva Beit Yitzchak is "working very well, it is only for boys," he pointed out.

He would like to see the community raise the money and "take ownership" of a high school within the next two years, he said.

Earlier, Denburg announced that, beginning this fall, two classes in advanced Jewish studies will be added to the Hebrew language course already available at Westdale Collegiate under the Board of Education's continuing education program.

It was also good news for Beth Jacob School principal, Larry Katz, who maintained that there can be no Jewish continuity without continuing Jewish education.

There is a need for post-bar mitzvah education, for Jewish family education, for adult education and for Jewish youth activities, but the chief focus, he said, "should be on the practitioners: teachers, youth directors and youth advisors. Their status is very low, their salaries are low, they do not get the support they need and many of them have very little training."

To ensure that the educators have the necessary skills, knowledge and background, said Katz, "we have to spend a lot of money on Jewish education."

Speaking on behalf of Na'amat, president Simone Rotstein called for greater cooperation among organizations, especially in the planning of community-wide events such as the Yom Ha'atzmaut celebration; more interaction between the different women's organizations; and most particularly, greater community support for the various youth groups.

"In any talks about strengthening the Jewish community," she said, "our youth need to take precedence."

In her introductory remarks, planning and priorities committee chair, Ina Frank, explained the importance of this and subsequent meetings, and also gave a detailed analysis of the composition of the Hamilton community which, according to 1991 Canada census figures, increased by 10.6 per cent to 5,145 since 1981.

A second meeting is expected to take place in October.

Budd helps push hockey in Israel

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The scene would be recognizable among young rink rats everywhere. Your shift as an attendant is over, the public has gone home, the doors to the arena are closed and you and your buddies have the ice to yourselves to play some shinny.

It's time to drop the puck and play until the ice turns to mush or the rink manager shuts the lights.

It's a winter scene in hockey-playing locales everywhere, even if the rink is in Metulla, only metres away from the Israeli border with Lebanon.

For Waterloo native Jeff Budd, a three-month stint in the Canada Centre recreational complex combined a little bit of arena life with the culture and lifestyle of Israel — a perfect blend for any red-blooded, hockey-loving Canadian with an attachment to the Jewish state.

Budd enjoyed his Metulla visit so much, he's going back for an extended stay. "I'm going back in a month," he said last week during his summer sojourn in Canada. "The hockey season starts in October and I'll spend the year in Metulla."

Budd is hoping to pick up where he left off in May when he ended a stint as a madrich (guide/counsellor) on the ice. As a volunteer at the Canada Centre, Budd did everything from fitting guests with skates to teaching Israeli kids the fundamentals of hockey.

He worked six days a week, spending much of that time on the ice. And he loved every minute. The Metulla opportunity was tailor-made for Budd, a young man of 24 who has spent summers as a camp counsellor. "I had a blast," he said. "I love to have fun with those kids."

Budd said that part of his duties included teaching young Israelis to skate and teaching teenagers the rudiments of hockey.

"The kids who play hockey love it," he said. "There aren't a lot of them, but they love it. They have good skills, shots, and good skating [ability], but they don't understand the mental part of the game," particularly the strategy.

In the hockey games the Israeli youngsters play, it's mostly "every man for himself" and positional play is unknown. That's where he comes in, trying to explain to them the structure of the game he learned by playing organized hockey in Waterloo until age 14 and watching years of Hockey Night in Canada.

It's hard for Israelis to understand the game when they don't see it on TV and when the rink is only about one-third of Olympic size, he said.

The Russian-born olim who live in Metulla and the surrounding area are Canada Centre regulars, both on the ice and behind the scenes, he said. The Centre staff includes several Russians, including some elite level coaches.

One, named Boris (Budd doesn't remember his last name), was a Soviet national short-track speed skating coach who made aliyah two years ago and who helps teach figure skating. Kostya Kaplan and another Russian also teach figure skating.

Misha Shmerkin, an oleh from Odessa, who was the first athlete to represent Israel at the winter Olympics, trains at Metulla, he pointed out.

Shmerkin has even traded in his figure skates for hockey boots and joined the shinny games. Budd's scouting report on Shmerkin? "He's a great skater, but his shot could use some work."

Budd's connection to Canada Centre began in a round-about manner. It started with his participation in the May 1993 Anguish to Hope Mission that took young people to Poland and then Israel.

"After going through that, I wanted to go back to Israel for a year," he said. "I'm not the kind who just writes a cheque. I like to do something physically."

After approaching United Israel Appeal (UIA) staffer Eli Rubenstein, he was directed to the skating/hockey program at Canada Centre.

But first he had to spend five months learning Hebrew at an ulpan on Kibbutz Zova, about 10 kms west of Jerusalem. Then it was north to Metulla, where the town provided him with a furnished studio apartment and some spending money. When he returns, however, it will be as a salaried employee.

Budd is enthusiastic about the upcoming year because last year's experience was so positive.

"It provided me the opportunity to really get integrated into Israeli society. I spoke Hebrew every day. You get a much greater understanding of the peace process and of Israeli society because of the language factor and the people factor," he said.

More than that, Budd may be blazing a trail for others to follow. Rubenstein said the UIA is considering a program of sending Canadian volunters to Metulla on a yearly basis.

That would be greatly appreciated by the locals, Budd said. Not only do they enjoy the facility built through Canadian generosity, but they really appreciated the presence of a Canadian volunteer in Canada Centre, he said.

Mike Katz

Hoops coach enjoys sport's ups, downs

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Mike Katz is no stranger to the thrill of victory or the agony of defeat.

As head basketball coach at Humber College, he's lead his squad to three national championships in the Canadian Collegiate Athletic Association from 1990-93.

And as an assistant coach of Canada's national basketball team, he's experienced his share of disappointment. The highly-touted squad had its medal hopes dashed at the World Championship of Basketball, where it finished seventh.

Despite that ranking and the high expectations that preceded it, Katz looks back on the championship series with relish. "It was my most exciting experience in sports," he said.

The tournament was the culmination of 10 months of hard work. "I [had] a pretty general role," he said. "I worked a lot with the players in terms of their skill development," helping them tackle deficiencies in their game like outside shooting.

"The experience of being with the team, especially with the calibre of the national team players, was unique. That in itself was rewarding and exciting."

Being exposed to the coaching techniques and defensive concepts of Del Harris, an LA Lakers coach who served as consultant to the Canadian team, was particularly rewarding, he said.

It all culminated in the championship series that attracted international media attention and a buzz of excitement, due in large part to the participation of Dream Team II.

Going into the tournament, the Canadians had compiled a 7-1 exhibition record and were confident a medal was within their grasp, he said.

Then came the game against Greece. Trailing by only one point, Canada had the ball with 30 seconds left. At a critical juncture, Boston Celtic star Rick Fox slipped and Canada's hopes went down with him.

Despite the loss, Katz is quick to credit the Greeks with fielding a very good team, one that was on par with Canada's squad. Greece held Dream Team II t a 10-point margin at the half, he pointed out. "I don't think they were any better than us, but they were no worse.

"We tried to come back after [the loss], but we weren't the same. We didn't have the same desire," he said.

Looking at the deficiencies of the Canadian team, Katz said its biggest problem in international competition is the absence of seven-footers that other teams field. "Other than that, we're developing players in other areas."

He discounted allegations from disgruntled players that the selection process was biased against blacks.

"The Canadian team had the best we had to offer when you factor in all the elements that go into a team," he said. Selected players demonstrated a willingness to accept a limited role and limited playing time, as well as their ability to add to team chemistry, he said.

With the world tournament behind him, Katz is now preparing for his 11th season at Humber College.

"For me, the experience can only enhance and improve what we do there. I picked up a wealth of experience and knowledge," he said.

Choosing Village Park Was A Family Decision

▲ Srul, Elaine, Bubby, Earl and Daniel Glick (owner of Village Park)

When we acquired Village Park we never imagined our own mother would move in. But after our father passed away we knew our mother couldn't live alone anymore. She needed round-the-clock supervision and nursing assistance. So we had a family meeting and decided to bring mom to Village Park. The nursing staff are wonderful and friendly, and the care is customized so each resident's needs are met. We're glad mother's at Village Park, and she's happy here. That's the most important thing.

Israel Opera House set to open

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

TEL AVIV — When the 1994/95 opera season opens in Tel Aviv in October, subscribers and friends will be treated to an exciting operatic experience.

The season opens at the new Israel Opera House in the recently completed Tel Aviv Performing Arts Centre at the Golda Centre, a complex that will house many of Tel Aviv's cultural events.

The new 1500-seat opera house is an example of the latest achievements in architecture, interior design, lighting, acoustics and sculpture.

Designed by architect Jacob Rechter, the Tel Aviv Performing Arts Centre reflects the cultural lifestyle of Israel — festive yet not ostentatious, elegant yet not alienating. The opera house will be the first performance space to be completed in the Golda Centre.

To commemorate this historical cultural event, Sara Sela, the wife of the former president of the Weizmann Institute of Science has initiated a unique program. She is inviting people interested in both the arts and Israel to come to Israel for a Gala Week that combines the opening of the opera house with an unusual cultural experience.

Sela has long been associated with the arts in Israel, particularly the symphony. As the international coordinator of the opening of the opera house, she has created a five-day Gala Week that includes a visit to the opening of the opera house and combines touring by day with social events hosted by Israelis each night to give visitors an opportunity to be part of a cultural Israel not seen in most guided tours.

Music lovers invited to participate

Meri Saguy, wife of the former consul general of Israel to Toronto, Gideon Saguy, and Marvelle Koffler, a supporter of the arts in Canada, have volunteered to work with Sela in providing information to Canadians interested in the Gala Week.

Saguy says that people from around the world who are lovers of music and opera are being invited to join this once-in-a-lifetime tour. "Proportionally, more Israelis attend the symphony and opera than anywhere in the world. I am thrilled to be associated with this project."

The gala begins Oct. 21 with an opening festive dinner hosted by patrons of the New Israel Opera. Participants will then attend the official opening of the Performing Arts Centre, under the auspices of the president of the State of Israel and Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin for a special concert featuring soprano Eva Marton and bass-baritone Simon Estes, with a premier performance of the New Israel Opera. The concert will be followed by a dinner/dance.

Other activities during the week include lunch at the home of the prime minister hosted by his wife, Lea Rabin, a lunch hosted by the Selas and a variety of other cultural tours.

Koffler says, "I think the people of Tel Aviv are so fortunate to have an opera house and we here in Toronto are not able to build one — this saddens me greatly."

Commending Sela's dedication to the arts in Israel, Koffler told The CJN that "all Sara's efforts are phenomenal — all she has done in the field of culture has been the greatest success. She has made a great contribution to the State of Israel through this many-faceted cultural event."

Tours will include Caesarea and the archeological ruins of the ancient Herodian port city Acre, Beit Shean, Tiberias, Jerusalem's latest archeological finds and visits to other historical sites.

All tours will start from the Tel Aviv Hilton Hotel, but participants may stay where they wish and participate in the touring and the social and cultural programs.

For more information on the Gala Week, contact Meri Saguy, (416) 967-1006.

New Book by Helen Epstein: Back in 1968, a twentyish American citizen from New York was visiting her native city of Prague when the unpredictable happened: the Russians invaded, ending the promising Czech spring of reforms, and stranding the visitor behind a newly-installed Iron Curtain, fortified by Soviet tanks. Helen Epstein's first-person account of these events, and how she was spirited out of the country, was published in the New York Times, thus launching a durable journalistic career that has also seen the publication of several books on Jewish and arts-related subjects.

Epstein is perhaps best known for her 1979 book Children of the Holocaust, for which she was again in Prague this summer, conducting a publicity tour for the recently-released Czech-language edition. The book, which chronicles the psychological effects of the Holocaust upon children of survivors, relates episodes from the lives of numerous such children, including several from Toronto.

Her latest work is Joe Papp: An American Life, a biography of the renowned New York theatre impresario who brought Chorus Line and many other immensely popular productions to the stage; he died at the age of 70 in 1991. The book was scheduled to be published this week by Little, Brown & Company.

Schindler's List on Videocassette: One of the most powerful Holocaust films ever made, Schindler's List deserves as wide an audience as possible. MCA-Universal's recent release of the film in a boxed, videocassette version should insure its availability to schools, libraries and private institutions. Although the film is devastating to watch, some individual viewers may also want to own a copy.

The Limited Edition Collector's set includes two video cassettes, Thomas Keneally's paperback novel, the soundtrack CD and a photo book containing stills from the film. Suggested retail price is $149.95. According to MCA-Universal, the acclaimed film has already been seen by more than 75 million people in some 50 countries.

Judaic Elements in American Folk Art: The exhibition Every Picture Tells A Story: Word and Image in American Folk Art is on view at the Museum of American Folk Art, Two Lincoln Square, New York, for four months beginning Sept 17. The show includes three significant examples of Jewish American folk art.

They are The Family Record, by Isaac Wachman, an embellished manuscript illustrating a marriage; The Ketubbah, by Zemeh Davidson, portraying a wedded couple's prenuptual agreement; and an untitled painting by Harry Lieberman, which seems at first to be merely a colorful painting, but upon inspection reveals itself as a commemoration of the Six Million.

On Oct. 12, museum director Gerard Wertkin lectures on Jewish Folk Art in America, and museum curator Stacy Hollander speaks on Harry Lieberman: A Journey of Remembrance.

Architect Gladstone unveils painting in Mount Sinai lobby

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Architect and artist Sander Gladstone recently unveiled his latest work in the Mount Sinai Hospital main lobby.

Love and Healing, commissioned to reflect the hospital's history and values, is an oil painting measuring 6½ by 5½ feet. It will hang permanently inside the University Avenue entrance.

In the painting, a grandfather sits in a wheelchair on a wooden dock where his grandchildren play with shovels and pails. Behind them is a flight of concrete steps leading to a grassy plateau, upon which sits the facade of the original Mount Sinai Hospital. A distant cottage, a small row boat and a somewhat concealed Star of David round out the work.

Gladstone told The CJN his painting is meant to show that intergenerational contact promotes healing, the importance of nature and the dedication of those who provide care in the hospital.

The facade of the original Mount Sinai Hospital implies the importance of community in maintaining collective wellbeing. The cottage symbolizes family.

"The general feeling of the painting is meant to be lighthearted, comfortable, and somehow understanding and empathetic of joys and setbacks of those visiting and staying at the hospital," Gladstone said.

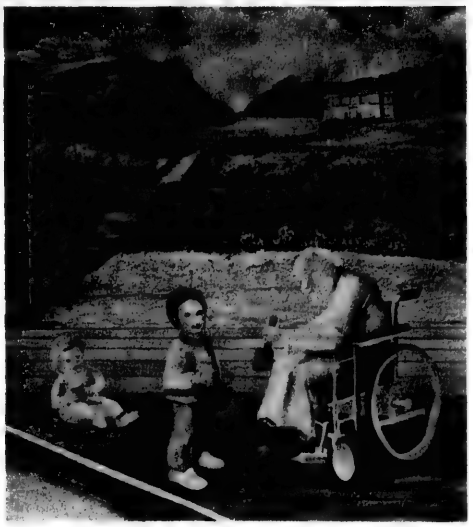
The soft, hazy colors suggest a fond memory or wishful thought.

More than 40 guests attended a wine and cheese party for the unveiling. Gladstone's grandfather Max and his two sons, Noah and Aaron, who appear prominently in the painting, were there, as were hospital representatives. While Max Gladstone may have been depicted as a convalescent in a wheelchair, "the truth, however, is that Max is proud to note that at age 94, he has never had to be in a wheelchair," said his grandson.

Gladstone received a bachelor of arts degree from York University and a master's degree in architecture from the University of Calgary in 1982. While studying in Calgary, he developed an interest in designing schools and synagogues. He has worked with Shaarei Shomayim Synagogue, Temple Sinai, Beth Tikvah Synagogue and others.

Recently, he established Sander Gladstone Architect specializing in residences, stores and offices. He is considering opening a Jerusalem branch office following a recent trip to Israel.

Gladstone's painting, The Immigrant (Return to the Land of Milk and Honey) hangs at the Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care. His paintings can be found in private collections in Toronto, Vancouver, Calgary, Los Angeles, Baltimore, New York, Jerusalem and Haifa.



Love and Healing by Sander Gladstone.

BOOKS

By BERNARD BASKIN

Putting Away Childish Things, by Uta Ranke-Heinemann (Harper-Collins, $16.95 (paper)).

The author of this bold and provocative book was the first woman professor of Catholic theology in a German university. When she taught that the doctrine of the virgin birth was a theological idea rather than a biological fact, she was removed from her position. She continues, however, to teach the history of religion at the University of Essen.

Where some of the major teachings of the Christian scriptures are concerned, she is an unabashed skeptic and iconoclast. The Catholic Church, she contends, is opposed to the use of reason and intellectual honesty. Instead, it encourages absolute belief in what she calls, a set of fairy tales. These include teachings about the birth and childhood of Jesus, the miracle stories, the account of the crucifixion and resurrection, the ascension of Jesus and other fundamentals of Christianity.

She writes about Jesus that, "We know neither when and where he was born, nor when he died; he is a man without a biography. We don't know how long his public activity as a preacher lasted or where exactly it took place. Strictly speaking, we don't know a whole lot more than that he was born, that there were people who followed him as his disciples, and that he was executed on the cross — the Roman version of the gallows — and thus came to a wretched end."

She makes clear that the curcifixion story sows seeds of hatred. Two thousand years after the fact it is still possible to quote from Christian scriptures and to have Jews themselves say that they deserve their persecution by Christians, and even their annihilation in the gas chambers.

"The calumny against the Jews in the New Testament became the Christian legal title to their persecution and destruction."

She quotes from a work by the American theologian, Rosemary Radford Ruether, who points out that these anti-Jewish trends were not an accidental excess of later Christian generations but were present in the Gospels from the very beginning.

In similar fashion, the story of the betrayal of Judas is without foundation and another example of anti-Jewish bias.

"By his very name Judas (which means 'Jew' in Hebrew) is labelled a representative of the Jews. Even if Judas the traitor never existed, there was always the Christian hatred directed not only at this man but at his whole people. And that real hatred is the bad side of this completely invented story."

False father

The attempt to relate Jesus to King David by Matthew and Luke through an involved and imperfect genealogy is rejected. "Both Evangelists present the birth of Jesus as a virgin birth, and yet at the end of their lists stands not the mother but a man who isn't even supposed to be the real father. And this is the person who guarantees the noble pedigree. A false father, a foster father, a putative father, a supposed father, an adoptive father, anything is better and more important than a real mother. Her descent plays not the slightest part in the story."

What is of supreme importance to the author is the unadorned life of Jesus and his attributes of mercy, love and peace rather than the theological mythology that obscures his real message.

Much of what Uta Ranke-Heinemann presents is not news for students and scholars of religion. But it will come as a surprise to many members of the laity who are unfamiliar with the findings of modern scholarship about the biblical world or how theological ideas develop and become frozen through the centuries.

Trip to Rockies is a real trek

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to The CJN

ALBERTA — Last winter, it was my pleasure to travel through the Canadian Rockies in the company of a guide named Ian Hipkins, a transplanted Montrealer who has lived around the mountains of Alberta for nearly 20 years, and has climbed nearly every Canadian peak between Calgary and the Pacific.

One clear crisp morning, we set out early from the Banff Springs Hotel for the drive up the Icefield Parkway to Jasper, normally a three-and-a-half hour ride. There are many who say that no more exquisite stretch of mountain scenery can be found anywhere in the world.

Being an Easterner, I was entranced by the continually unfolding panorama of peaks, painted in the tranquil shades of morning; and by the slender lodgepole pines and firs along the snowy ribbon of road. The drive was going smoothly until, passing through the Columbia Icefields, we reached the section of highway known as the Big Bend.

There we encountered a Parks official who was erecting a barricade and a sign: "Road closed due to avalanche control."

Somewhere a bit further on, he said, a work crew was about to shoot down a dangerously snow-laden slope with a Howitzer 105 mm cannon, an operation that might last as long as an hour.

We got out of the van and walked back to a section of the mountain known as the Weeping Wall because of the waters that pour down its immense and nearly vertical height in summer. Warmed by sunlight, several tiny avalanches descended the rock-face. After a few minutes, a larger cascade caused a delicate veil of white powder to rise gently in the still air.

Walking further, I spotted some animal tracks in the snow, which Hipkins said most likely belonged to a fox. In his treks through the backwoods, he has encountered even the rarest species of indigenous wildlife.

Once, he said, he had to stop his car for a mother lynx and her five cubs as they straggled across a remote northern road.

I questioned him about some of his other animal encounters, and he was soon advising me not to panic if ever confronted with a charging grizzly bear in the wild.

TRAVEL TALK

By BILL GLADSTONE

New York Holocaust Museum Gets Go-Ahead: After years of planning, Elie Wiesel, honorary co-chair of the New York City Holocaust Memorial Commission, signed a lease last week for construction to begin this fall on the Living Memorial to the Holocaust-Museum of Jewish Heritage. The location is Battery Park City, in lower Manhattan.

Construction should cost about $15 million and take over a year. The proposed hexagonal design of the building is meant to symbolize both the six million Jewish Holocaust victims as well as the six-sided Star of David. Committee members have been collecting artifacts and survivors' testimonies for years, in anticipation that this facility would eventually be built.

Seeking Tomb of Genghis Khan: No, his name isn't Indiana Jones and he doesn't wear a fedora or carry a trademark whip. Nonetheless, 62-year-old amateur archeologist Maury Kravitz of Chicago has made arrangements with Chinese authorities to begin a massive search for the hidden tomb of the 13th-century Asian conqueror, Genghis Khan. (One of the earliest and most influential travelogues was written by Marco Polo, an Italian who ventured eastward into the Mongol leader's vast domain.)

Kravitz, who has been studying Genghis Khan for 34 years, is presently attempting to raise $5 million for a scientific expedition into Mongolia's north-eastern steppes. He anticipates that the trek into this remote, roadless wilderness, which boasts many rivers, will begin in the spring. "I believe there is lying in the ground the greatest unretrieved treasure trove in the history of the world," he says. As a condition of his permission to search, Kravitz has agreed to turn over whatever he finds to the Mongolian authorities. "This is not a treasure hunt," he emphasizes. "This is a histo-geographic expedition."

Regent Launches Winter Season: One hundred pages in full color, the latest brochure from Regent Holidays (effective October '94 to April '95) is a sumptuous catalogue of touristic possibilities involving sun, sandy beaches, watersports and colourful drinks at poolside. The Mississauga-based mass market travel company offers vacations at 66 hotel and resort properties in 21 destinations in eight countries in Central and South America, the Caribbean and Mexico.

New destinations this year include Panama's Contadora Island, Morrocoy and Macuto in Venezuela, the Montelimar Resort in Nicaragua, and La Roman Resort in the Dominican Republic. (It's "business as usual" for that country's tourist industry, which is seemingly unaffected by the political strife in adjoining Haiti).

Introduced several months ago, Regent's packages to Israel start from as low as $1,339. "Israel is a fabulously unique winter destination for all of us," exuded Regent president Peter Linnett at a recent product-launch luncheon for travel agents. "The peace process has opened up new vistas of tourism."

In addition to its winter destinations and Israel, the company continues to offer packages to various trans-Atlantic destinations, including England, Egypt, Greece and Turkey, with Jordan soon to be added — all "at prices that used to be unheard of," said Linnett. "Our competitors try but can't touch us at the moment. We've consigned them to the never-ending dust. Perhaps we've lost them in the sands of the Sahara."

Regent recently introduced a new deferred payment plan which allows customers to pay for their holidays over a 12-month period following their departure. Operated in conjunction with Avco, Regent ReadyCredit would allow travellers to enjoy a $3,000 vacation, for example, for a dozen monthly payments of $280.35. "We believe there is the possibility of an enormous new market here," said Linnett of the system, which he said was a new innovation in the Canadian mass market travel business.

For a copy of Regent's winter brochure, see your local travel agent.

Shana Ha-Ba'ah B'Yerushalem: "There are two classes of travel: first class, and with children," American writer Robert Benchley once wryly observed. However you travel, and in whatever company, may you always reach your destination safely.

As the leaves of the calendar fall away, and the New Year begins, so do the leaves of the forest turn colors and fall away. A thought to meditate upon, as you journey through the yellow woods: many are the paths one treads in a lifetime, but more numerous still are the paths not taken.

Best wishes and good health to you for the High Holidays. May we all be together again next year in Jerusalem, as in days of old!

"You've got to remember the main reason a grizzly charges is because he's short-sighted and needs to get a closer look at you, that's all," he assured me. "He's just being curious about his territory. One time, I was with a group of five or six campers, and we had just climbed above the tree-line, and there was nothing around us but scree — bits of broken rock from the mountain; and all of a sudden I spotted a grizzly bear charging toward us from about 100 or 150 feet away. I just had time to say, 'Nobody make any sudden moves and whatever you do, don't run. There's a grizzly bear coming toward us. Just stand there in a tight circle and hold your ground.'

"And I, as the leader, stood slightly off to one side — someone the bear would instinctively recognize as the protector of the group. The bear came right up to us, stopped, sniffed at us, shook its great big head, and walked away. Its curiosity had been satisfied."

Another time, Hipkins and some companions spotted a pair of wolverines performing a rarely-seen mating ritual.

"They were standing on their hind legs, facing each other and jumping back and forth, pushing their forepaws into each other," he said. "We spotted them while still quite some distance away, and the wind was with us. We advanced quietly through a hollow to a ridge over which the wolverines were dancing, engaged in this mating ritual, quite oblivious of our presence.

"Unfortunately, in my stupefaction, I stood up, and the wolverines spotted me. At that instant the female began running in the opposite direction, away from us, and the male began running toward us. Are you aware of how vicious the wolverine is? It's considered one of the most deadly of animals. So, with this wolverine approaching, I said, 'Quick, everybody, get up — now!' and everyone rose from their position behind the ridge.

"Have you ever seen those cartoons on television where an animal is pedalling backwards in an attempt to stop suddenly? It was like that. The wolverine was willing to attack if there was just one person — but seven? That was too great a risk. Still, it didn't just turn tail and retreat. It made a few gestures towards us, and then loped off at its leisure," Hipkins concluded.

During our conversation, we had heard a brief, distant thunder (which we took to be the noise of the man-made avalanche), followed by the faint echoing sound of snow-plows at work.

Soon thereafter, the Parks official signalled that the road would be open again soon.

But instead of walking back to the van, Hipkins pointed to a clearing beyond a stand of pines, where about six or seven elk were quietly grazing. They didn't seem to mind as we approached; Hipkins explained that they like it best when a frontal approach is made, and even better if the animal doing the approaching is chewing its cud: he showed me how adept he is at this. We spent several minutes among the elk before returning to the van.

On the way up to Jasper, Hipkins told me that he once stayed with a herd of mountain goats for hours, lying on his belly with a camera, and chewing his cud so the animals presumed he was a harmless grazer, just like them.

Holt Renfrew

Joel Rath

Joel Rath has always pursued excellence.

That commitment has grown since Rath was appointed president of Holt Renfrew, the nation's largest specialty retailer, in February 1992. Rath says owner Galen Weston asked him to make sure the 157-year-old chain would remain vital well into its third century of operation. "I was up to the challenge," he laughs.

Rath, 56, came to Holt Renfrew, with its 12 stores and de luxe image, from the specialty stores division of Sears U.S.A. Above his desk hangs a framed motto — "We are here to serve our customers in any way we can."

Holt Renfrew recently announced a $30-million expansion to add 65,000 square feet of space to the Montreal, Toronto, Ottawa and Vancouver stores. The expansion is the second stage of growth and repositioning since Weston purchased the company from American owners in 1986. Holt Renfrew does not release sales figures.

Rath spoke to CJN reporter Amy Sattin in his Toronto office about the newest expansions and the business of selling high-end goods in Canada.

CJN: Who do you see as your customer? Do you target women more than men?

Rath: Our target has to do with our basic operating mission — we are a business that is interested in bringing quality, fashion-sensitive merchandise edited to good taste and the lifestyle of our perceived customer.

CJN: Who is your perceived customer? Is it mainly a woman?

Rath: No. There are many more categories of women's apparel than there are men's, but we certainly want to perform with the same attention to detail, for men and women.

Our customer is an adult customer, who is sophisticated in their sense of quality, design — meaning really 'line' — and who recognizes value.

CJN: Do you have a demographic in mind when you say adult?

Rath: I believe we live in an ageless world, and that quite honestly my [grown] daughter, my wife and my mother-in-law really [have] the same needs.

The social experience and the body type begin to sort certain categories of clothes. Obviously, an 18-year-old, a 30-year-old and a 70-year-old have different bathing suit needs, and that is pure gravity. We're more interested in body type than we are in perception of age. We cater to an adult, active individual, a person who is doing things, who is participating in life. . . because participation in life is what causes fashion to exist. We study the lifestyle of that customer and try to match clothes [to it].

CJN: When studying the lifestyle of your customers, have you reached any particular insights?

Rath: Those of us in the fashion business have to focus more carefully on how people look and how they feel. We observe that worldwide. Whether you're in Florence or in Toronto, the young people gathering outside a disco in the evening look rather similar.

People have always wanted to look wonderful, and I believe will always continue to want to look wonderful.

CJN: Given that, what has changed over the last few years to make you optimistic enough to invest $30 million in further expansions now?

Rath: We believe we [should] create environments where our [staff] is interested in our customer's needs and understands the product.

We have a vision for each of our plants to present the merchandise in an atmosphere that showcases it to its best advantage and brings a comfort level for the customer to shop. If we do that, we believe that in each of our markets our business will continue to grow at a rate that will justify our investments.

CJN: What makes you sure the investment will be rewarded?

Rath: First of all, Holt Renfrew has been in business in Canada since 1837 [in Quebec City] and the relationship between the Canadians and Holt Renfrew over that long time has been consistent.

We have had throughout Canada positive business trends that indicated to us that it was time to expand and enhance our business because the customers were voting in favor of [it].

CJN: The $30-million expansion is the second stage of a long-range business strategy. When was that strategy first conceived?

Rath: Any business must clearly have a focus and a mission. Any business that tries to be everything to everybody is not going to succeed.

[After Galen Weston acquired the business], the Sherway Gardens store opened to serve that part of the community, our Winnipeg store moved into a new store, our Calgary store was moved and relocated into a marvellous new plant, this [Bloor Street West] store was dramatically remodelled, the Vancouver store was dramatically remodelled. That was a phase of refurbishment and remerchandising to create that continuing consistency of attention to detail.

This particular phase we have announced now is the next phase, and that phase includes the opening of a series of greystone buildings that were attached to our Montreal store, which will allow our store to be a four-level selling environment connected by escalators — being more customer-friendly, in all honesty.

CJN: What's the next stage of the business plan then?

Rath: Well, we have just announced this phase . . . and we will open our new men's installation [in the concourse of the Bloor Street West store] which is taking our men's store from 7,000 to 18,000 square feet.

CJN: Are there new markets you're thinking of opening up, new customers you're thinking of targeting? Are you going to diversify, or amalgamate?

Rath: The fashion business has to move, change, evolve. Sometimes you give a little space, sometimes you take a little space — not every year, but over a several year period. We saw a period where sportwear expanded as a portion of a man's wardrobe. Now we're moving into an era where men's matched clothing will be an increasingly important part of the wardrobe. It is being accepted by the younger part of our customer market as a wonderful way to look in their sportwear hours.

CJN: Is targeting that younger part of the market going to be an increasing priority?

Rath: No. [Our customer base] includes perfect figure types, which more often than not are young. Historically, the young had beautiful bodies and the older had terrible bodies, but that's no longer true.

We operate what we refer to as small urban or suburban units, which are in the 25,000 to 30,000 square foot range — our store in Quebec City is substantially smaller than that [but it may soon be brought] up to prototype size. The other concept is our major urban store, which would operate in the 60,000 plus square foot environment.

CJN: It doesn't sound, then, like going past 12 stores is really part of the plan for the near future.

Rath: We certainly are looking at Vancouver for an additional outlet, and are open to new ideas, but our primary focus is to make sure these existing units are in the presentation standards that we think best flatters our merchandise and the shopping experience. This stage should be completed in 1995.

CJN: At that point, will you set new goals?

Rath: We are a business which has an ongoing, strategic, going-forward plan. We don't develop a plan, lock it in and not change it or think about it until that five years is up. This is an ongoing planning process. We believe we know what our goals and operating strategies are, and each year we are revising our plans based on the trends in fashion, life and economics.

CJN: Well, our readers would like to know what to expect in the future.

Rath: We would hope that your readers will perceive that we are a business that has a residential attention to excellence and sensitivity to the goods we sell. . . We believe that more is not necessarily better, but more can be better if we are serving the customer with more convenience.

CJN: You're not planning any major changes?

Rath: We just announced a massive expansion of our business, and that expansion, along with looking at other opportunities for locations, is a need for our kind of business. We will make that judgement as that opportunity comes along.

CJN: You spoke about Galen Weston bringing Holt Renfrew back to Canadian hands. Is there a growing role that Canadian-made garments or Canadian designers are going to play?

Rath: We are very conscious of the recognition that there is extraordinary needlework available in Canada.

It is the charge of our merchants to seek the best they can find, best meaning quality-value relationship. In that regard, Canadian participation stands high. I believe it will expand. We have our own design studio where we employ many designers-sample hands — we don't release the numbers — who create sample goods, and most of that is then manufactured in Canada.

CJN: There are rumors that a Bloomingdale's store might move into downtown Toronto. Is that going to give you pause for thought?

Rath: We look at the the world market, at all of the great stores — everything from Galeries Lafayette in Paris to the little stores on Rome's Via Spiga to the independent specialty stores in Canada. We look at all of them, and decide there is something to be learned.

[Like] the gift-flower shop at Takashimaya on 5th Avenue in New York. It is a combination of antiques and gifts from around the world and a perfectly suberb French florist. They have melded the three of these into a little shop that is maybe 1,000 square feet, at most, and it is the most delightful retreat from that magnus of 5th Avenue. It has inspired me.

CJN: How often do you travel?

Rath: Out of 365 days of the year, I am not in this office half of the time, and I would have to say that's to my great credit. Our role is to support and know and what our stores are and what our customers want in those stores. This is not the headquarters, this is merely the central coordinating link. We learn only when we are with our stores and we get motivated from the creative forces that exist in the worldwide markets.

CJN: You recently, on behalf of Holt Renfrew, presented a $60,000 research grant to Dr. Larry Guilbert to study HIV fetal transmission. Do you personally support other causes, like those in the Jewish community?

Rath: I do not talk about my personal philanthropy. I am pleased to work for a business that believes it has a responsibility to the nation and the communities we operate in to be good citizens.

Dramatic changes on TASE examined in year-end review

By DOV HOCH
Special to The CJN

TEL AVIV — Last Rosh Hashanah is a good point of departure for reviewing the dramatic changes in the Tel Aviv Stock Exchange (TASE) over the past year, as that holiday week included an event which greatly influenced the stock market: the signing of the Declaration of Principles between Israel and the Palestine Liberation Organization (PLO).

With the signing of this agreement, investors' expectations rose and companies began gearing up to take advantage of the "peace dividends."

Many of Israel's large companies had already begun enjoying the benefits of Israel's formalized diplomatic relations with more than 45 countries. The promise of regional trade and increased foreign investment spurred an interest in many companies' stocks.

Bezek, Israel's telecommunications monopoly, for example, recently began exporting communications hardware and know-how to Hungary, Poland, and the former Soviet republics of Azerbaijan and Kazakhstan.

The Maof index, which reflects the stocks of Israel's larger companies, had failed to breach the 200 mark in August. It rose 13 per cent last September and by the end of November it peaked at 255 points — a dramatic 30 per cent rise in three months.

A record 1.9 million tourists and business people entering Israel in 1993 — with an anticipated 5 million by decade's end — has resulted in a government decision to build a new terminal at Ben Gurion airport, at a cost of $500 million.

Projections for multi-destination regional travel and land-links to neighboring countries led Tourism Minister Uzi Baran to call for the doubling of Israel's 32,000-room hotel capacity.

As a result, when Africa Israel Hotels made a stock offering in October, investors were so optimistic about the benefits of peace that the stock offering was over-subscribed by 2,050 times!

However, the largest stock price increases were reported by the smaller companies. The Caram index, which reflects the stocks of smaller companies, concluded 1993 up an astounding 77 per cent (55 per cent after adjustment for inflation).

However, as winter of 1993 approached, a grayer reality shadowed the stock market. The loss of optimism began with the failure to implement even the modest terms of the PLO accord.

Caused investors to lose confidence

But other events also caused investors to lose confidence. The government, for example, was not able to sell off Bank Hapoalim shares, which it had acquired, together with the controlling interest in other major banks, during the 1983 share crisis. Inflation then also began to creep upwards, and in November and December 1993 the Bank of Israel raised interest rates by a total of 1.3 points.

The resulting reductions in the money supply held back economic growth and, with little news on the horizon, the market was poised for what analysts call a "correction," but which is more commonly known as a "nose-dive" — the most precipitous one since the 1983 crash when share prices fell 65 per cent.

Small investors, who had invested their savings in stocks after the market's initial boom, received a heavy blow as share prices dropped 30 per cent from their peak. By summer 1994, stocks were trading well below their pre-Rosh Hashanah prices.

But the hardest hit were those who took out loans during the bull market to make stock purchases. In fall 1993, before the interest rate hike, the major banks (who, not coincidentally, also function as stock brokers) were offering good terms on loans for stock purchases.

The end of the bull market, which dashed so many hopes, can be attributed to a number of factors.

In January, the chair of TASE broke the taboos against talking about the market, and stated that stock prices were overvalued. The Clinton-Asad summit the same month, brought home the reality of the situation between the two countries.

Then, in February, minor market players were arrested for manipulating share prices.

By March, full-blown scandals linked a manager of Israel Discount Bank's provident fund to unauthorized purchases and collaborations to run up share prices. Moreover, after the huge fall-off in stock prices, it came to light that many public companies had been looking for a "quick buck" and invest disproportionately in the stock market, instead of in their core business activities.

The final nail in the coffin, the closure of the territories after the Hebron massacre in March 1994, is still affecting the entire economy. Sixty thousand Arab construction and agricultural workers have been kept from working in Israel. As a result, housing prices have soared, and both the consumer price index (CPI) and inflation have shot up.

Market may be affected by Middle East relations

The Central Bank's often stated target inflation rate of 8 per cent seems far off. Interest rates rose several times this spring and inflation already stood at 13 per cent for the year. The greatest optimists are now predicting no less than 10 per cent inflation this year at best.

However, there is room for hope that the Israeli stock market will make a comeback. Mark Meiras, managing director of the consulting firm Pacific Mediterranean Investments, says, "I've seen it from the Philippines to Brazil, first the local boom, then the local bust and finally the foreign boom, which leads to economic growth and thus qualifies a country as an 'emerging market.' We've already seen the first two phases in Israel."

Arnon Zahavi, a lecturer at the Capital Markets College in Tel Aviv, agrees with Meiras that the fundamental factors driving the Israeli economy are strong, despite the fall in stock prices.

"The Finance Ministry is pointing to two per cent growth in 1994 and seven per cent growth in 1995," says Zahavi, noting that the TASE usually indicates what the economy will look like in the near future, not over the long term.

"For example, during the Gulf War, share prices fell up until the start of the war, then despite the fact that Scuds were falling on Tel Aviv, they rose." To really gauge the strength of the economy, he says, "we'll have to wait and see the company results for the third quarter."

As the Jewish year 5744 ends, investors on the TASE are treading more cautiously than this time last year.

"No fast track to building an economy"

Like the shofar's blast, Israelis received quite a few "wake-up calls" during the year, reminding them that there is no fast track to building an economy. Relations with the PLO and Israel's neighbors will probably continue to be the main factor affecting the stock market in the new year.

Advances of 30 per cent in a matter of weeks are probably events of the past; but there is reason to believe that Israel's capital markets are on the way to more long-term, stable growth.

As Meiras says, "Take a look at what's going on in Dizengoff Centre [in Tel Aviv]. It's teaming with activity. That's what drives the economy."

Tips From Pros

By AARON COHEN
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Did you know?

State of Israel Bonds are now RRSP eligible.

There now exists an opportunity for Canadians to invest in the economic future of Israel, while helping their self-directed RRSPs or RIFs to grow.

So what is a self-directed RRSP, and how does it work? A self-directed RRSP offers an investor the ability to hold a wider variety of investments within one single plan. (Investments such as GICs, Mutual Funds, Government of Canada Bonds, Common Shares, and State of Israel Bonds to name a few.)

Many individuals have GICs and mutual funds, as well as bonds and other investments in their RRSPs at various institutions. Under current legislation from Revenue Canada, each RRSP account at each institution is restricted to owning a maximum of 20 per cent of the book value (cost) of the account in foreign content.

In a self-directed RRSP, you are allowed to invest in a wide variety of investments. Consolidating your RRSPs into one self-directed RRSP would allow you to maximize your foreign content position while maintaining the same investment strategy you have at the various institutions.

Additional capital

Some people are willing to sacrifice earning an extra 1 or 2 per cent per year in their RRSP for the sake of convenience. But . . . do they realize the ultimate cost of 1 or 2 per cent per year?

To illustrate this point, here is a quick example: assume you contribute $10,000 per year, for 30 years to your RRSP. Here is what your RRSP would be worth at the end of the 30-year period, assuming the following annual rate of return:

8%	10%	12%
$1,223,000	$1,809,000	$2,703,000

If you increased your rate of return from 8 per cent to 10 per cent each year, you would have $586,000 of additional capital at retirement. You can see how even a slight improvement in your rate of return each year can make a big difference at retirement. As well, many feel that a self-directed RRSP is more convenient than a traditional RRSP, since most transactions can be facilitated over the phone with your private account number.

With the High Holy Days around the corner, hundreds of thousands of dollars worth of Israel Bonds will be purchased. As well, it is important to realize that any Israel Bonds you may already have, can be transferred into your self-directed RRSP, and therefore compound tax free for you immediately.

With various State of Israel Bonds to choose from, which all offer competitive interest rates and no transaction fees, you are offered long term investing and an opportunity to help support the people of Israel.

American Express Set To Expand

JERUSALEM — American Express is planning to expand its activities in Israel and in the area, American Express International Business Development President James Lee told Finance Minister Avraham Shohat.

At a meeting with Shohat, Lee showed a new travel guidebook to Israel and the Middle East which will be published next week and distributed by the company's offices throughout the world.

Shohat said the progress from the peace process is promoting greater interest from tourists who want to visit Israel and the region.

Mortgage Program for Kibbutzim

JERUSALEM — Israeli Finance Minister Avraham Shohat last week announced a 67 million shekel mortgage program for kibbutzim, whose dire financial situation has made it impossible for them to borrow money from commercial banks in order to build housing that would attract new members.

The Treasury approved the granting of 1,400 special mortgages at preferential rates. However, Treasury spokesman Elisheva Braun said the terms of mortgage repayments have yet to be set.

Braun said Shohat decided on the special mortgage program since kibbutzim's financial straits have created a vicious circle that is blocking their recovery.

"The kibbutzim cannot borrow money to build new housing, so that they can attract new members, in order to expand their productive capacity, and therefore be able to pay back their debts," said Braun.

The mortgages will not be extended to kibbutzim situated in areas of the country where there is high demand for land. Those kibbutzim will have to sell their land to finance new housing.

FACES OF ISRAEL

Two Israeli soldiers — one a paratrooper of Ethiopian origin, standing guard in Hebron; the other a new recruit, picking grapefruit on a kibbutz in the Galilee. She came to Israel with her family 14 years ago when then prime minister Menachem Begin offered refuge to Vietnamese boat people. [IPPA, IDF photos]

For out of Zion shall go forth Torah, and the word of the Lord from Jerusalem. And He shall judge among the nations, and shall decide among many people: and they shall beat their swords into plowshares, and their spears into pruning hooks: nation shall not lift up sword against nation, neither shall they learn war any more.

— Isaiah 2:3-4

In a year that began and ended with historic handshakes between the State of Israel and its one-time enemies, 5754 also contained much to rejoice, and to weep, over in between.

Israel's bookend agreements with the Palestine Liberation Organization and with Jordan in many ways overshadowed other events, like the Canadian elections and the sentencing of French war criminal Paul Touvier, which affected us as Jews, Canadians and human beings.

We watched in hope as South Africa moved towards its first democratic elections in April, and in horror as corpses piled up in Rwanda and Zaire, victims of vicious tribal killing and the wasting illnesses of refugees.

We cheered European breakthroughs like the exchange of ambassadors between Israel and the Vatican, and the sound defeat of anti-Semitic Hungarian politican Istvan Csurka, who collected only 900 votes in that country's May elections.

We joined together to commemorate the 50th anniversaries of events like the wholescale rescue of Danish Jews in 1943 and the D-Day invasion of France, which turned the tide of war against Germany in 1944.

And we learned of the need to ensure Jewish continuity in our communities, and to continue to press for the prosecutions of Nazi war criminals and hate mongers.

But for many it was the electrifying changes in the Middle East that defined 5754. PLO leader Yasser Arafat and Israeli Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin crossed ideological and political gulfs in their commitment to Palestinian self-rule in the West Bank and Gaza.

Rabin crossed a further barrier between Israel and Jordan as King Hussein's guest in Aqaba following the recent peace developments between the two countries. The links being forged between Israel and Jordan may someday result in a formal peace treaty. At the same time, the violence in Hebron and the terrorist attacks that killed Jews in Israel, Buenos Aires and Panama proved that peace in the Mideast is not on everyone's agenda.

SEPTEMBER (Elul/Tishrei)

• The Declaration of Principles is signed by Israel and the Palestinian Liberation Organization on the White House lawn in Washington, D.C. Israeli Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin and PLO leader Yasser Arafat capture the world's attention with a handshake and their promise to continue working towards peace in the region. The Israeli Knesset later approves the accord in a 61-50 vote.

The agreement calls for Israeli troop withdrawals from the West Bank and the Gaza Strip within three months, Palestinian prisoner releases, self-policing and eventual elections.

Canada pledges $55 million over five years to develop the West Bank and Gaza, over and above the $7.8 million it channels into the region annually. The money will go towards homes for Palestinian refugees living in Egypt, a rainwater cachement system and the development of Palestinian institutions. Canada was part of an international drive to kick in $2 billion for the Palestinian self-governing authority.

• Ashkenazi Chief Rabbi Yisrael Lau is received in the Vatican, a first for an Israeli chief rabbi. Rabbi Lau, in Italy for a conference of Jewish, Muslim and Christian leaders, discusses the need to end religious strife and anti-Semitism with Pope John Paul II.

• The Vancouver telephone network Canadian Liberty Net is ordered by the Canadian Human Rights Commission to stop broadcasting racist messages. In a 50-page report, the commission finds that complaints of "discriminatory practice" brought against the telephone line by Canadian Jewish Congress, Pacific region, and the Committee for Racial Justice are justified. The Net now operates from the United States.

JNF's blue boxes have helped make Israel bloom

By LEILA SPEISMAN
CJN Staff Reporter

For many people, the familiar Jewish National Fund blue box was their first experience in supporting Israel.

What the JNF does with the blue box contents, and with the other funds it raises, is nothing less than, to use a poetic turn of phrase, making the land bloom.

Since its founding at the 5th Zionist Congress in Basel in 1901 (it came to Canada, as it did to the rest of the Jewish world, shortly after), it has planted some 200 million trees over 200,000 acres, and continues to plant over 5,000 acres a year.

The JNF cares for an additional 100,000 acres of natural woodlands, has reclaimed over 250,000 acares of land for agricultural use, has purchased 650,000 acres of land for settlement and has prepared the infrastructure for some 1,000 settlements, including those specifically for new immigrants.

This is in addition to blazing roads through mountains and deserts, caring for pasture land, and providing picnic, recreation and tourist facilities and parks.

An important responsibility of JNF, an especially vital one these days when the water supply is such an integral part of the peace negotiations, is to build reservoirs and dams to expand Israel's water supply for industry, agriculture and domestic consumption.

It also conducts and supports research into such subjects as afforestation, pest control, fire prevention and land use.

In Toronto, JNF is a beehive of activity.

New blue box chair Leonard Exton is full of enthusiasm. He hopes to increase the number and prominence of blue boxes, in residential, institutional and retail settings.

One proposal is to establish distribution centres around the city, where contributors can both pick up and hand in the boxes.

He also hopes to run an active public relations campaign.

The tree-selling program will also be expanded. Executive director Ben Prossin told The CJN that besides encouraging the purchase of trees for specific occasions, such as births, memorials and anniversaries, JNF "will stress the importance of trees to the environment and quality of life in Israel."

He said that people will also be encouraged to buy groves or woods.

A cruise on Lake Ontario scheduled for last month supported the purchase of a fire engine for Ben Shemen. Prossin explained that this is essential since Ben Shemen is what is called an "old grove" of trees, that is, one where the trees are older, and thus in greater danger of catching fire.

Plans are being finalized for the 46th annual Negev dinner, to be held November 27 at the Sheraton Centre. Honoree will be philanthropist Joey Tanenbaum, Toronto chair Patricia Alpert announced.

Arrangements are also being made for the annual MEGA tour to Israel, scheduled for February of next year, and for the CAARI program, in which seniors spend two months in Israel.

Conscious of the need to encourage more lay people to become involved with JNF, the New Leadership and University Students' divisions are expanding their programs as well.

And as always, the Tu Be'Shevat celebrations will be a major event in schools and the community as a whole.

"One of the three best restaurants in downtown Toronto"
NEW YORK TIMES

"The cuisine is thankfully untainted by the new fangled. The specialities are steaks that are bloody fabulous! THE GLOBE AND MAIL

"Reverential service and the best steak in town!" EN ROUTE

"A typical CARMAN'S feast – Greek olives and garlic bread, salads, steak too good to leave, wines that were just right and fine brandies! Arrive hungry, depart with a blissful glow of satisfaction". TORONTO SUN

"The steaks are tender, the back ribs crunchy. Portions are huge!"
WHERE TORONTO

"The best steaks in Toronto ... so tender you could cut it with a fork! Mr. Carman, you are an institution for very valid reasons. I'll be back soon!"
TORONTO STAR

"Simply think of stead as good as it could possibly be!" L.A. TIMES

"The biggest, the best and the most garlicky steaks in town!"
ROCHESTER DEMOCRAT

"No fancy or trendy foods pass through here, just wonderful steak and remarkable ribs that have consistently pleased steak lovers for three decades!" GOODLIFE

"Carman's assures thick charcoal-broiled steaks that are trimmed of all visible fat which meets purists' requirements. Service is gracious, informed and attentive." TORONTO LIFE

"Carman's zestily sizzled steaks are possibly the finest beef this city has ever seen! A Pound a piece, they are seared to crunch on the outside and wonderfully tender succulent and flavourful inside."

Rosh Hashanah is a time of introspection

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Supplement Editor

The new year for our secular neighbors is an unequivocally happy time. It is a time for celebration, get-togethers with family or friends, enthusiastic gatherings around city halls.

It is also the time when everyone makes resolutions for the coming months, most of which are quickly abandoned when the dark days and cold winds of January make good intentions just too depressing to think about.

For Jews, the beginning of the year, Rosh Hashanah, is very different. While it is indeed a happy time, filled with terrific food (often too much of it), family (often too much of that too) and the bone-chilling blasts of the shofar, there is another whole aspect to it.

Rosh Hashanah is Yom Hadin, the day of judgment. We believe that on Rosh Hashanah G-d begins the task of deciding the fate of each of us for the coming year.

It is difficult to be unrestrained in one's joy when one thinks of G-d sitting in Heaven and shaking His head, as it were, over our last twelve months.

Perhaps this is why Rosh Hashanah is such a time of introspection for Jews. Many of us find it a sad time, as we think of kindnesses we should have performed, duties we have slacked. And for many it is even sadder as we think about people for whom the heavenly judgment was not according to our, or their, prayers.

It is also a time when we examine our lives in a concrete and critical way. We determine, often, that we will make changes.

This is a good time, we think, to decide to study Torah more, and to work with our children, maintaining our patience and good humor as they learn and grow into, we hope, proud and contributing members of the Jewish people.

This also a time of introspection for families. Some have children making the giant leap from pre-school to grade school, some from elementary to high school, others from high school to university or yeshiva, often in Israel.

Young men and women are starting jobs, or moving away from home. We recognize that life for them — and us — will not be the same.

Our oldest daughter will begin university next month.

When one talks about rites of passage, this one has to rank with the biggies.

It is not only that she is exchanging the child-like atmosphere of high school for the rarified atmosphere of university. It's what that rarified atmosphere is going to mean to her.

She will meet and interact with not only Jews of all theological stripes, but also with people who aren't Jews at all. And she will be confronted with philosophies and ideas that are antithetical to everything she has spent her whole life learning.

We have made sure that our daughter got a first-class Jewish education, in a school where she was taught not only the basic premises of our faith, but the philosophical underpinnings of that faith.

Perhaps more to the point, we made sure that she felt comfortable questioning her teachers and us about anything that concerned her.

Let me point out now that this is a young woman who questioned everything, always. From the time she was two, and refused to wear gloves until she felt for herself that 20 below zero was actually cold, she has refused to accept "because that's the way it is," or "because I say so" as any sort of answer at all.

She believes that she can cope with any radical notions university can throw at her. Intellectually, I realize that she is probably right. She has a confidence in the rightness of Judaic belief that leaves me in awe.

Maybe the reason I am frightened is that she will be on her own — and not only without the support of a staff and student body that shares her values. She has also reached the stage where, quite rightly, she, as will all these young people, will be independent of us.

There is a link in the Torah between Rosh Hashanah and Pesach. Rosh Hashanah is considered the beginning of the year, the time the calendar year starts. But in the book of Exodus, in Parshat Bo, G-d tells Israel that the months are counted from Pesach, as that is the date of our freedom from slavery, the beginning of us an in independent nation.

So too for my daughter, and for so many other daughters and sons. Rosh Hashanah is the time when we reflect on what kind of parents we have been, and what kind of person our child has developed into.

And, as G-d did Israel on Pesach, we watch our children take their giant steps to independence. I think G-d will understand if we say an extra special prayer for them.

To all our children, and to all of the very loyal CJN readers, K'tivah v'chatima tovah, may G-d inscribe you in the Book of Life, for a good and sweet year.

Munich museum puts focus on Jewish exhibits

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
CJN Staff Reporter

Richard Grimm calls it "a statement of atonement."

Munich's Jewish Museum, tucked away in two small rooms at 36 Maximilianstrasse, was founded by Grimm five years ago.

It's his "gift" to a city where the Nazi movement gained much of its impetus before Hitler's accession to power in 1933.

As Grimm put it: "I was born in Munich, so I wanted to make a statement of atonement and reconciliation for my hometown."

A 48-year-old Bavarian Catholic, Grimm is an art dealer with close ties to Munich's Jewish community, the third largest in Germany after Berlin and Frankfurt.

As a student, he was a co-founder of a German-Israeli youth circle. Later, he served as Hans Lamm's executive assistant. Lamm, who died in 1985, was for many years president of Munich's Jewish community.

After Lamm's death, Grimm began thinking seriously of starting a Jewish museum. It was not an original idea. It had been discussed since the 1960s, but nothing had come of it.

By the spring of 1989, Grimm was ready to begin, having acquired through auctions and dealers sufficient material to launch his museum.

Not surprisingly, the first exhibition was on the theme of atonement and reconciliation as expressed through children's art.

Grimm and Rachel Salamander, the proprietor of Munich's only Jewish book store, sponsored a contest and the best pictures submitted by Bavarian pupils were placed in the exhibition.

Since then, the museum has mounted 15 different exhibitions on topics running the gamut from Raoul Wallenberg, the Swedish diplomat who saved thousands of Hungarian Jews, to the former Venice ghetto.

The current exhibition, which ends in October, deals with Shanghai as a safe haven for Jewish refugees of Nazi persecution.

It will be followed by an exhibition on Aufbau, the German-Jewish newspaper published in New York City. It starts in November and closes next February.

A month later, the museum will sponsor an exhibition on Jewish soldiers from Munich who fought in World War I. (Approximately 12,000 German Jewish troops fell in battle from 1914-18).

The museum's permanent collection, though modest, is quite striking.

It consists of, among other things, an 18th century map of Palestine by Bartholemus Seutter, the official cartographer of the Hapsburg royal court; a 15th century woodcut on Solomon's Temple by Hartmann Schedel; a 19th century wooden figure of an Orthodox Jew; and a 17th century copper engraving of a Frankfurt pogrom by Jan van Luyken.

Although the museum has had close to 60,000 visitors since 1989, it is not listed in all guidebooks. And Germany For the Jewish Traveller, a brochure published by the German National Tourist Office, ignores it altogether.

Admission to the museum is free. It's open three days a week — Tuesday and Wednesday (2 p.m. to 6 p.m.) and Thursday (2 p.m. to 8 p.m.)

Shofar makes us consider creation, life

By RABBI BERNARD RASKAS
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

Rosh Hashanah, the commemoration of the creation of the universe, is a difficult concept to grasp.

That is because it has to do with the idea of time. Even the essential symbol of Rosh Hashanah, the sound of the shofar, exists only in time. It cannot be seen, touched, felt or tasted.

In the roller coaster of life, we need to understand time and the timeless. Awash in trivia, people need ceremonies to remind themselves that they are part of something important, if not mysterious. We Jews, for example, have a blessing for sighting a rainbow or the ocean, for our food, for beginnings and endings. As Kohelet put it, "there is a time for everything."

Life is precious and life is sacred. As we move about God's world, we must walk with reverence for creation. We are of the universe and are its caretakers. On Rosh Hashanah we reaffirm our responsibility to cherish the life of the universe.

A story about one of our great atomic physicists illustrates this concern for all living things. This man, one of the chief architects of the atomic bomb, was out wandering in the woods one day with a friend when he came upon a small tortoise.

Overcome with pleasurable excitement, he took up the tortoise and started home, thinking to surpise his children with it. After a few steps, he paused and surveyed the tortoise doubtfully.

"What's the matter?" his friend asked.

Without responding, the great scientist slowly retraced his steps as precisely as possible and gently set the turtle down upon the exact spot from which he had taken him up.

Then he solemnly faced his friend and said, "It just struck me that for one man, perhaps I have tampered enough with the universe."

He turned and left the turtle to wander on its way.

This is a recognition that we must have a sense of reverence for the life of the world.

Rosh Hashanah also comes to mark the end of the old year and there is a time for letting go. We need to let go of our children so they can grow up. We need to let go of our anger and our guilt. We need to let go of certain traumas and events of the past so we can experience the many opportunities of the present and the future.

We need to let go of material objects when we become overly dependent on them. Letting go does not necessarily mean to physically relinquish the object. We need to overcome our own dependency on the object and realize that the essence of our being is not the material object.

Creation is part of everyday living. The daily wonders of God can be seen in the birth of a baby, the budding of the trees, the varieties of the birds and the infinite glory of the growing flowers.

Creation may also be reflected in the endeavors of the artist who continually seeks to add beauty to life even as the reactive person desires to deepen the experience and meaning of life itself.

This thought was given fine expression by Rabbi Abraham Heschel in his book, The Sabbath.

"Creation, we are taught, is not an act that happened once upon a time, once and for ever. The act of bringing the world into existence is a continuous process. God called the world into being, and that call goes on," Heschel wrote.

This coming Rosh Hashanah, the sound of the shofar summons us to consider that life is all about time and its use.

IN THE BEGINNING

A detail, depicting Noah's Ark, from Israeli artist Dan Rubinstein's stained glass window on the theme of creation.

Rubinstein's window is one of five recently installed at Jerusalem's Misgav Ladach Hospital. Entitled "The Creation," the windows depict the early stories from the Book of Genesis.

Rubinstein's work, which took more than three years to complete, consists of some 7,000 pieces of colored antique glass, and covers an area of 30 square metres.

Noa steps into music's big leagues with new album

World Zionist Press Service

When she speaks Hebrew, she's an Israeli Yemenite. When she speaks English, she's distinctly New York. And when she sings, she's sublime.

This past year, Noa (Israeli songwriter and performer Ahinoam Nini's spiffy new stage name) has established herself even more internationally. Her newest album, entitled simply Noa and released March 1, promises to be a quantum leap into the big league. Produced by mega-stars Pat Metheny and Steve Rodby on the prestigious Geffen label, it was recorded at the famous Hit Factory and Power Station studios in New York City.

Sophisticated pop, jazz, folk and Yemenite — Noa's singing is as rich and textured as her background. Refusing to be packaged as American, world-beat, or ethnic, she has insisted on weaving the strands of her American-Israeli-Yemenite background together in her own unique way. The result is passionate, moving, and intensely honest.

Born in Israel to parents of Yemenite descent, Noa's family moved to the United States when she was only six months old. She grew up in New York City, attended both yeshivah and the renowned School for the Performing Arts. At 17, she returned to Israel on her own, where she completed high school and her compulsory military service.

In early 1990, Gil Dor, an accomplished guitarist and a graduate of the Berklee School of Music in Boston, invited Noa to perform with him at a jazz festival in Tel Aviv. They have continued to collaborate ever since.

Noa and Dor have appeared in concerts throughout the world, to unanimous acclaim. Intense and outspoken, Noa recently met with WZPS's Etta Prince-Gibson to talk about her art, her beliefs, her doubts, and her aspirations.

WZPS: Your background is American-Yemenite-Israeli, but your music is not easily defined. What has influenced you the most?

Noa: I am a combination of all these different backgrounds, and they have all impacted on my music. I guess the primary influence has been my American upbringing, which began with the singer-songwriters of the '60s, such as Joni Mitchell and Simon and Garfunkel, and on through Prince and Sting and the finer jazz performers. And I have always loved Broadway. But my Yemenite roots are very important to me, too. They were always there — in the food, the books, the culture and the music we enjoyed at home.

WZPS: How do you put these different traditions together?

Noa: Very arbitrarily, I guess. However I see fit, in whatever way serves the purpose — the idea that I am trying to convey, the image, the lyric, or the melody I hear in my mind. I use them like Lego, like pieces to build the final result that I want to create.

WZPS: Is this what has made your music so special?

Noa: This makes my music very spicy. But the songwriting itself is also very important. I think my songwriting is good and strong, and you don't find that much anymore. Music today seems to be based more on atmosphere or on the production.

But I am a songwriter. Gil and I are not producers of music; we want to be perceived as artists. My music is an ongoing, lifelong process of work and creation. Consciously, I try to take things in new directions all the time, so that I can grow and experience and expand.

WZPS: You were six months old when your family left Israel, and you grew up in New York City. What made you choose to come back to Israel?

Noa: I cannot disconnect myself from my American being, but I never felt fully American. I didn't belong there. My parents chose to go to America to study, and they wound up staying. They have done well for themselves. But the prospect of staying there and having Israeli-American hybrid children did not seem right to me. And I was 17 and I was in love. So I also followed my heart.

It was beyond logic. I think all important decisions are. Something inside you moves you, tells you to go, just go. You can list the pros and cons, but then you throw the list away and do what you feel is right. You see, it was the right decision. The most fabulous things in my life — marrying my husband and meeting Gil Dor and the collaboration between us — have happened here.

Ahinoam Nini (Noa) in concert

WZPS: Does living here make your music more Israeli?

Noa: The longer I live here, the more I am influenced by Israeli music, especially the older, more classical music. But I certainly don't fit any stereotypes about Israeli music! Because I create here, what I do is contemporary Israeli music, and I think it is interesting.

But sometimes, audiences expect me to fulfil their expectations of what Israeli music is supposed to be. I cannot do that, and I would like my audiences simply to appreciate and be proud of something that is original and beautiful and bold that comes from Israel. I am proud that as Israelis, we can open ourselves to other traditions, without losing our own identity.

Some people were offended because we recorded Ave Maria on our new album. But I didn't think of it as Christian. I thought that the music was beautiful, and that the words fit what I wanted to say. I love taking a piece and making it my own, whatever its origins, and infusing it with my own identity.

WZPS: You are also different from other Israeli performers in that you have expressed your political views openly.

Noa: Yes, I believe in the current peace process and I have been very outspoken about this. In the past, I could not justify what my own government was doing, and it was difficult for me to travel abroad; I would do acrobatics around policies I didn't believe in.

Expressing your political views can shift your audience, and in Israel, performers like us have a very small audience to begin with. So I am not critical of performers who do not do this. But I made a conscious decision that I cannot sit and do nothing while the fate of this country is being formed. If I do nothing, then I am being irresponsible. So I enrolled myself in a political party, the left-of-centre Meretz party, and I attend rallies and demonstrations.

This is where I live. I have to take a stand. And if my music has made me fortunate enough to have the attention of some people, then I will use that gift in the most positive way. This is just as important as singing about love, life and emotion.

Noa: Yes, last spring we recorded in Italy with a Palestinian group made up of performers from Nablus, Jerusalem and Kuwait.

It came about by chance, when we were double-billed at a concert in Italy. We became friends, and we talked a lot and argued, and we got to know each other and to understand each other. I had never met a Palestinian before; I though that they were 'the other,' different from me. It was wonderful to meet them, to see how much we have in common.

The bottom line is that history can't be erased, but we can have a mutual goal for the future — peace. So we recorded the Beatles' song, Come Together. They translated the words into Arabic, and we translated them into Hebrew, and it all came together for us, too.

Israeli novelist's work pensive, controversial

World Zionist Press Service

At 7:30 a.m., when his wife, Michal and children leave for work and school, David Grossman, like some sort of medieval monk-scholar, retreats to his basement. Doorbells, phone calls are ignored.

Considered by many to be Israel's premier novelist, Grossman spends much of his time in the nether regions of his home pacing. For six, seven, eight hours a day Grossman walks back and forth, leaving imperceptable tracks on the hard stone floor. When he is ready to write, he has the tenacity to work up to 17 hours a day.

David Grossman recently turned 40. He began writing 12 years ago when he left Israel Radio (he had been working there since he was 10), following a dispute over his left-wing political views. He is one of the few — if not only — Israeli novelists who can live off his writing.

Grossman has four published novels, two major works of non-fiction, a collection of short stories, children's books and a play.

His third novel, The Book of Intimate Grammar, was an instant hit in Israel when it came out in Hebrew in 1991. On Sept. 1, the novel will appear for the first time in English in bookstores in the United States and Great Britain. It will appear in Germany and France at the same time. The Dutch and Italian editions are already out, and it will soon be published in the Scandinavian countries, Spain, Brazil, Japan and Czechoslovakia.

Grossman will be spending the first two weeks of October in New York, Boston, Washington, D.C. and St. Louis on a promotional tour arranged by his American publisher Farrar Straus & Giroux.

Grossman, a slight, bespeckled, young-looking man with thinning reddish hair, holds up the British jacket of The Book of Intimate Grammar. "What do you think?" he asks, admitting he isn't quite sure himself.

Grossman is no newcomer to the foreign market. Many of his books have been translated into at least a dozen languages.

The New York Times has compared him to Dostoyevsky, Gunter Grass and Gabriel Garcia Marquez and a cover story in the Jerusalem Report a few years ago, predicted he would become "the world's favorite Israeli writer."

His books have been reviewed by just about every major publication in the English-speaking world and literary accolades have been awarded by Germany, Italy and Mexico.

Grossman's books are not what one would expect from runaway best-sellers. They are pensive — almost brooding — controversial and painfully thought-provoking.

His two books of non-fiction, The Yellow Wind (1987) and Sleeping on a Wire (1992), take the reader directly into the heart of the Israeli-Palestinian conflict, opening up a pandora's box of moral and ethical questions.

His first novel, The Smile of the Lamb (1983), is one of the first literary treatments of Israel's presence in the administered territories. His second novel (published in English before the first), See Under: Love (1987), penetrates the horrors of the Holocaust from a perspective few writers would have dared.

His fourth and much lighter novel, The Zigzag Child, written ostensibly for young adults, will be translated into English and other languages.

Success seems to have had little impact on Grossman. He is warm, down-to-earth and utterly familiar. Letters from readers (he answers them all) interest him far more than professional book reviews.

He owns a video camera and is as comfortable talking about his 10- and 12-year old sons' homework — "What do they get out of it anyway?" — as he is discussing Kafka, his literary godfather. Books and toys vie for space in his Mevasseret Zion home, a suburban community 10 minutes outside of Jerusalem.

It's almost deceiving. Grossman's home-self seems diametrically opposed to the tormented characters that populate his books.

Behind his cordiality, his thoughtful, sometimes distant gaze, one can almost sense demons lurking, each struggling to burst forth centre stage with a myriad of conflicting ideas.

When Aron, the hero-portagonist of Grammar, says he sees himself "at the centre of a battlefield, striving against suffering and death," it could easily be Grossman talking about his own writing.

The Book of Intimate Grammar (beautifully translated into English by Betsy Rosenberg) is about a young Jerusalemite who doesn't want to grow up. Grossman takes us on a magical — and agonising — journey into the inner world of Aron Kleinfeld as he becomes painfully aware of his friends' emerging masculinity, his father's overwhelming sexuality, of the world's carnality.

An adolescent Tiresias, Aron internalizes everything around him to such an extreme, that the outside world becomes nothing more than an animated and meaningless picture screen.

Grossman talks about Aron with the intimacy and hesitancy of a parent discussing a child. Presented through a series of internal monologues, Aron's perceptions are so piercing, so recognizable, the novel is at once an excruciating and exhilarating read.

According to the author, the book is about human confinement; it describes what it is like for the human spirit, "the ultimate expression of freedom," as Grossman puts it, to be entrapped in something "so limited, capricious and impersonal as one's body." It is, says this former philosophy major, "the ultimate dichotomy."

"More than anything," he says, "the novel is about the birth of an artist, about the development of something spiritual and creative in an environment that is mundane and materialistic."

His almost 2-year-old daughter Rutie comes in, climbs on her father's lap and he continues.

"Grammar was my most difficult book to write." He thinks for a second, then laughs. "Maybe that's why it's so readable," he says, almost to himself.

"For three years I stood exposed to the harsh brutality of those adolescent years," says Grossman. "My childhood was a much happier one than Aron's. I had a lot of friends, but at the same time I felt isolated. How is that possible?"

Compared with the large-scale subjects of his earlier books, Grossman admits that at first he couldn't imagine who would want to read about a place so small, minute.

Grammar takes place in Bet Hakerem, a small middle-class neighborhood in Jerusalem (where Grossman grew up), during the years leading up to the 1967 Six-Day War. The book recaptures the nuances, the mood of the time.

"It's about the mentality of a generation immigrants and all the energy they invested in their children," says Grossman. "They wanted to raise strong, independent Israelis freed from the claustrophobia that permeated the country at the time."

Aron is the antithesis of the dream. When he stops growing, his overbearing mother Hinda and rather loutish father, Moshe, look at Aron as a personal insult.

Grossman says the passage he had the most difficulty writing — as an Israeli — was Aron's asking when the war was going to happen to "them" already.

"As a child," Grossman recalls, "the Six-Day War was central to my existence. I was sure I was going to be killed."

Does Grossman consider himself an Israeli writer, a Jewish writer, or simply a writer who happens to live in Israel and happens to be Jewish?

"No, no, there are no 'happens to' in my case," says Grossman, who is adamant that his children grow up in Israel. He clearly thinks of himself as both very Israeli and very Jewish.

A committed secularist (his grandparents were religious, his parents are traditional), Grossman began studying the Talmud two years ago, calling it the first post-modernist text ever written.

He considers himself lucky to have been born at this juncture in Jewish history. "After 2,000 years we have the privilege of having our own nation," says Grossman, who is guardedly optimistic about the prospects for peace. "To be able to create our own reality, our own values, our own language, is a rare opportunity, indeed."

Grossman admits he has written little since his daughter was born but reveals that a new novel is in the planning — rather pacing — stages. He himself isn't sure what it will be about.

"A book, after all, is much more intelligent than the person writing it," he says.

He gets up, videotapes his children playing in the garden, discusses dinner, all the while contemplating his inevitable descent back to the basement.

Na'ama residents favor peace, good relations

World Zionist Press Service

Matat Rosenbloom, 36, has few illusions and little hope for the future of Na'ama, the small moshav (farming village) in the Jordan Valley where she has lived for nearly 14 years.

"I don't think we have much of a future here," she says sadly. "Politically, financially, and socially, I am afraid that things are very grim."

Na'ama, the only Jewish settlement located to the east of the Jordan Valley Road, has suddenly found itself right in the middle of Palestinian autonomy. The autonomous city of Jericho is only 900 metres to the south, and the autonomous village of Upa, linked to Jericho by a single road running along the perimeter of Na'ama, is only a kilometre to the north. To the west are mountains, while to the east, minefields and barbed wire mark the border with Jordan.

The bypass-Jericho road, hastily mapped-out as part of the autonomy agreement, is, in reality, only used by the army to patrol the border. It is bumpy, unpaved, dusty, and dangerous, and clearly unsuited for regular travel.

The moshav itself, home to 27 families, mostly in their mid-to-late thirties, was established by the World Zionist Organization in 1982 as part of a plan to settle the Jordan Valley and provide a security belt around Israel's vulnerable heartland.

But the second Likud government defined Judea and Samaria as priority areas for settlement, and money sorely needed for Na'ama's expansion and development, particularly for implementing high-tech, computer-monitored hothouses for its flowers and herbs, grapes, bananas, and dates, was not forthcoming.

Dusty and neglected, most of Na'ama's houses are small, with few amenities. There are few gardens or tended public spaces and the heat is oppressive and unrelenting.

While Na'ama has faced numerous difficulties since its establishment, including the failure to establish viable agriculture and the lack of commercial or public services — grocery stores and other shopping, schools, recreational facilities, and the like — the autonomy plan and the unresolved future of the area, coupled with ongoing economic difficulties, are responsible for the present atmosphere of dejection.

"People feel distress, hopelessness," says Eitan Rachimpoor, 37, Na'ama's secretary general. "The stress can be felt in personal relationships, in family life, in the social atmosphere here. Some people are close to emotional breakdowns."

To make things worse, the Gaza/Jericho plan, together with the after-effects of the massacre in Hebron, have radicalized Jericho, and the settlers of Na'ama are now regularly stoned and even shot at as they travel the Jordan Valley roads.

The drought of 1993 dealt what many perceive to be the final blow. Hopes of building new hothouses dried up together with the grapes and dates.

While settlements in the Jordan Valley exported more than 3,500 tons of grapes and marketed another 7,000 domestically last year, this year's harvest is less than half that.

Rachimpoor insists that security, economics, and politics are linked, and has demanded that the government declare Na'ama an agricultural disaster area so that it can receive emergency financial aid.

In May 1993, when Prime Minister Rabin visited the area, the entire adult population of Na'ama chained itself to the fence along the border with Jordan.

"I have been here for nine years," says Meller, "and I still have nothing. Without government aid, I can't even plant for next year. That's why we chained ourselves to the fence."

The widely publicized demonstration seems to have produced some results, and the government has promised to provide one million dollars in emergency aid to enable the residents of Na'ama to rehabilitate their hothouses and vineyards.

"We're not winning, and we don't need to be pitied," insists Rosenbloom. "I'm willing to continue living here, even for an interim period, because this is my home. But if the government wants me to stay, it must strengthen and support me. I'm not a beggar, but if we are providing a security belt for the whole State of Israel, we must at least have some financial security."

Rachimpoor is optimistic and believes that the promised financial aid will help get the moshav back on its feet to face this period of uncertainty. "If we are helped financially, we can face the other difficulties. As to the future, I don't believe we will have to evacuate. I believe that we will be able to stay here."

But others are less optimistic. "I was born in Riga, and I came to Israel in 1974," says Meller. "I came to Na'ama in 1985. My three children were born here. Now I am 36 years old. If we have to evcacuate the moshav, where will I go? How will I be able to start all over again at age 40?

Take time to devour a good book between chicken soup and kugel

By LEILA SPEISMAN
CJN Staff Reporter

The avalanche of books that has descended on my desk these past few months has run the gamut of literature — from books for young people, to history, to rabbinics, to Holocaust works.

While the early arrival of the holy days this year may make it seem ridiculous to even think of such frivolities as reading, rest assured that between the kugel, the davening and the relatives there will be a few minutes to sit down, relax, and, well, frivol with a good book.

****

We may like to think that children are miniature versions of us, but in fact they have their own unique view of the world.

Prime examples can be found in-David Heller's Just Build the Ark and the Animals Will Come (Villard Books, 1994).

Heller has collected children's responses to biblical stories and problems — and the results are often hilarious, often surprisingly acute.

The lasting punishment G-d gave Canin, according to a 10-year-old, is that he had to act like a nerd for the rest of his life; an eight-year-old explains the difference between G-d and Satan as, "God is like my mother and the Devil is like my little brother," and the snake convinces Eve to eat the forbidden apple by, says an 11-year-old, assuring her that the apples are low calorie.

On the other hand, Dean, 10, notes sagely, "Abraham wasn't preachy. He probably just led by being an example. You should do that too."

Sacred Celebrations; a Jewish holiday handbook by Ronald Isaacs and Kerry Olitzky (Ktav, 1994) is an excellent guide to family holiday observances.

The authors discuss the significance, customs and blessings of both major and minor holidays, and give worthwhile and interesting ideas for family discussions and activities. Even games are included.

A similar type of book is Torah; the growing gift by Steven Steinbock (UAHC Press, 1994). It follows the outline of the Bible, from Creation to the death of Moses, giving synopses of the events, questions, puzzles and exercises.

I especially liked Steinbock's asking children to look around them for three details that they never noticed before, the intention being that they appreciate the many small miracles constantly happening in the world around them.

Looking for something to do with your kids during the long holiday (or Shabbat) afternoons? Savor The Bird of Paradise and Other Sabbath Stories, by Steven Rosman, illustrated by Joel Iskowitz (UAHC Press, 1994).

This is a delightful collection of short stories and parables adapted from Yiddish and chassidic tales, and the Talmud.

While they all teach or illustrate some sort of moral, they are by no means preachy or sickeningly sweet. They are perfect for adults and kids to curl with together, and find lots to talk about.

****

Very little fiction, this time, but I did enjoy Gloria Goldreich's That Year of Our War (Little, Brown, 1994).

During the last year of World War II, 15-year-old Sharon Grossberg has to deal with her mother's death, her subsequent move to live with her hot-blooded aunts and uncles, her fears for her father who is serving overseas, and her own tremulous steps towards adulthood.

Interspersed are the conflicts of a family coping with different philosophies of life, the harsh realization by American Jews that Franklin Roosevelt was not the saviour they had thought him, the terrifying information leaking out of Europe about those Jews who had remained.

This is an excellent, moving and gripping read.

It is only now that the teachings of Rabbi Joseph Soloveitchik are appearing in print with any degree of frequency, thanks to the efforts of his students and followers.

History, continuity make for fascinating reading public lectures of Rabbi Joseph Soloveitchik (Ktav, 1994).

This is a work to be studied, not glossed over. It includes his noted On the Nature of Man, discussions of the Haggadah, the nature of repentance and holiness, and the relationship between man and G-d.

It is particularly appropriate to be read during the High Holy Day period.

Well-known scholar and writer Jacob Neusner has produced a fascinating Introduction to Rabbinic Literature (Doubleday, 1994).

There is a fine and detailed discussion of the nature and significance of the different types of rabbinic writing, as well as explanations of various individual works such as the Mishnah, and commentaries on Song of Songs, Ruth and Esther, and the effect of rabbinic writings on the development of Judaic thought.

While the book may seem daunting at first glance, you will find yourself caught up in Neusner's discussions.

Not quite as esoteric, but fascinating all the same, is Reuven Hammer's Entering Jewish Prayer (Random House, 1994).

Hammer discusses and explains the different prayers in the Siddur, their history, importance and relationship to Judaism.

He also deals with the differences between the Temple services and synagogue rite.

****

Jewish continuity is the buzzword of the decade, and Hertzel Fishman's The Challenge to Jewish Survival (Behrman House, 1993) deals with that very topic.

Fishman doesn't just accept the notion that Jews should remain Jews; he tries to show just why this should be, as a religion and as a nation.

There is an excellent history of the development of Zionism, and of Arab-Israeli and Israeli-Diaspora relations.

An interesting work of history is Matthew's Christian-Jewish Community by Anthony Saldarini (University of Chicago Press, 1994). This book discusses the book of Matthew in the Christian Bible, considered the most "Jewish" of the Gospels.

Saldarini discusses this book in relation to the early formation and development of the Christian church. He also describes the relations between the early Christians, both those formerly Jewish and those formerly gentile, and those who remained faithful to Judaism.

Relations between Jews and Gentiles discussed

Relations between Jews and non-Jew in the Hellenistic and Roman worlds is the basis of Jew and Gentile in the Ancient World; attitudes and interactions from Alexander to Justinian by Louis Feldman (Princeton University Press, 1993).

Judaism, Feldman shows, was not universally seen as either evil or undesirable. Indeed, he says, many scholars saw Jews and Jewish practice as attractive or, at least, virtuous.

This was reflected, he says, in the respect with which the Jewish faith was shown by many Greek and roman governments.

Edmund Mandel tells his story in The Right Path; the autobiography of a survivor (Ktav, 1994). Mandel endured the horrors of Nazi labor camps and then the anti-Semitism of the brutal Communist regime in Hungary.

This is not a noble, saintly reaction to unspeakable suffering. Mandel is bitter about his experiences, bitter about the betrayal of those he considered his friends, bitter about the hypocrisy he saw everywhere.

Even the United States, where he found freedom, is not immune from the occasional wry comment.

Your name is Renee; Ruth's story as a hidden child by Stacy Cretzmeyer (Biddle Publishing Co., 1994) is the poignant and frightening story of a child who flees from house to house, is protected by a network of kind French people, and eventually finds refuge in a convent.

The sadness is increased by the realization that Ruth was only eight at the end of the war, and had had to play a role her whole life.

Another world view is told by Steven Jacobs in his Rethinking Jewish Faith: the child of a survivor reponds (SUNY Press, 1994). Jacobs tries to reconcile religious faith with the horrors of the Holocaust. He also demands that Christians examine their traditional faith, in view of the fact that those professing it frequently actively assisted the Nazis.

****

And to end on a cheerful note, try a delightful new cookbook Basically Blue; a collection of blueberry recipes by Fern Walker (Creative Bound Inc., originally published 1986, seventh printing 1994). Muffins, biscuits, cookies, squares, sauces and teas tempt you to use those beautiful and delicious sapphire-colored fruits in captivating ways.

The recipes are simple yet imaginative.

Israeli settlement looks to the future

"We are moderates here," she continues. "Most of the residents in Na'ama are in favor of the peace process. And it was natural that Arafat would come here to be with his people. We have always had good relationships with the Palestinians in Jericho and Uja, and we wish them well and hope they succeed."

Rosenbloom agrees. "We want people to know that most of the people here are ready for territorial compromise, even if it means giving back our homes. It is the uncertainty which is so difficult to bear."

Ilana Levi, 34, is dejected and bitter. "It's very hard to live here now. It's like living in a prison, and the walls are made up of autonomy, uncertainty, and the financial difficulties. There is no air here any more. When Rabin and Peres signed the peace agreement, they didn't think about its effect on people. I am very much in favor of the peace agreements, but now we are in never-never land: we aren't evacuating, and we can't develop; how can we live like this?"

David Ben Haim, 37, agrees. "We are the guinea pigs of the government. We are Rabin's bargaining chip with Arafat. We are only 27 families here, alone, with no future. I believe that Na'ama will not have to be evacuated, it will die little by little.

"I was an idealist when I came here, but now, I have no hope. It is very hard for me to say this about my home, but no one needs Na'ama anymore. We're just in the way."

Yet the residents of Na'ama are not packing their suitcases, at least not yet. And despite her fears, Rosenbloom is planning for next year.

"I came here because I had a dream, to build a new settlement, to contribute to the State of Israel, to become a successful farmer," she says.

"If we just sit and wait, we'll go crazy. The only way I can cope is by doing. I'll develop my hothouses and try to be a successful farmer, because that is what I am. The government itself doesn't know what will be in the future, and neither do we."

Palestinian police cause concern for PLO, Israelis

World Zionist Press Service

For many Israelis, the presence of 9,000 Palestinian policemen stationed in Gaza and Jericho is the most worrying outcome of the agreement signed with the PLO in Oslo in September 1993.

Opponents warned that the police force would be comprised of terrorists bent on Israel's destruction who at best would turn a blind eye to the murderous activities of Hamas, and at worst might turn their weapons on Jews.

Supporters argued that despite the risks there was no logical alternative. An effective fighting force had to fill the vacuum left by the Israel Defence Forces (IDF) and Arafat had to be trusted to enforce law and order.

According to Oded Ben Ami, spokesman for Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin, intelligence sources have scrutinized the police force's composition.

"Under our agreement with the Palestinians," he explained, "we reserve the right to reject police candidates whom we feel are inappropriate. We have already exercised our veto."

Brothers Rajah and Amar Abu Sitah, for example, Fatah Hawk members wanted for the 1993 murder of Gaza settler Uri Magidish, were among those rejected by Israel.

But government assurances do not soothe opponents' fears. Many of them feel that even if the policemen have not been involved in terrorist attacks against Israelis, their orders come from the Fatah leadership, which has.

Two thousand policemen are being recruited locally, while 7,000 have been recruited from the Palestinian Liberation Army (PLA) in countries such as Egypt, Jordan, Tunisia and even hostile countries such as Iraq, Yemen, Libya and Algeria. Rabin said the latter recruits have the advantage of lack of personal involvement in the intifadah.

In fact in Gaza, a number of local Fatah Hawks resigned their commission after several days, unable to work together with the returnees.

Likud chair Binyamin Netanyahu raised other fears. "Each of the policemen is being allowed to bring his family with him. As we know, Arabs have large families. Maybe as many as 100,000 will return. This is the start of the return to the territories of millions of Palestinians."

Official government figures put the number of family members at 28,000 and officials in the prime minister's office have confirmed that Israel will not object to their coming.

As the Palestinian police began arriving in Israel in May, Israelis were struck by their literal lack of uniformity — some wore blue uniforms, others different shades of green or camouflage fatigues — and the fact that some were grossly overweight, old and even infirm.

Palestinian police hope for success

Rabin said the Palestinian police "have functioned very well considering that they lack logistical and financial support." A senior IDF officer also told reporters that the police have thus far demonstrated eagerness to succeed, a high level of discipline and a sincere desire to cooperate with the IDF and uphold their part of the Cairo agreement.

"When one IDF brigade replaces another, it is much less organized than what we have so far seen from the Palestinians," he said.

But doubts still remain. "The autonomy deal," said Likud MK Binyamin Begin, "left foreign affairs and security matters in Israeli hands. The police force puts security into the Palestinian domain."

And with Arafat and other PLO leaders in Tunis pointedly not using the word "police," but rather "our forces" or "our army," many Israelis feel justified in their concern. Arafat's "forces" are being armed with Kalashnikov automatic rifles, and their officers with pistols. Israel has also agreed to their having 120 vehicles that carry medium machine guns, including 45 armored personnel carriers and 30 jeeps. A Tunisian report said the police would also have six helicopters, including two for Arafat's personal use.

A number of incidents have exacerbated fears. Shortly after the Israeli withdrawal from Gaza, two IDF soldiers were shot dead near the Erez checkpoint. The murderers were not pursued and escaped into Gaza.

In another unfortunate incident, five Israelis carrying guns were arrested while shopping in Jericho (but immediately released), and an Israeli collecting Arab workers in Gaza had his tires shot out when he failed to stop at a Palestinian road block.

In May, the Palestinian police shot more than 250,000 bullets while celebrating. A 10-year-old Arab boy was fatally wounded during the festivities.

A senior IDF officer attributed such incidents to a lack of orientation on the part of the Palestinian policemen.

On the whole, the joint patrols comprising Israeli and Palestinian soldiers were functioning well. In Jericho, a Palestinian patrol car leads an Israeli patrol car on the main roads, while the Palestinians bear sole responsibility for other roads in the area. In Gaza, the joint patrols are led by Israeli police along the three main thoroughfares heavily travelled by Israelis, and are under Israeli authority.

A month after their arrival, the Palestinian police were beginning to take control on the ground. The turning point was the murder of two Palestinian "collaborators" by Hamas at the end of May. Maj.-Gen. Nasser Yussef, the Palestinian police commander, was said to be infuriated by the killings and swiftly issued a statement condemning the gunmen and vowing to pursue them and bring them to justice.

"Those who attack our people," he said, "attack our rights as a national authority. I am ready to martyr 100 policemen to catch them."

A month later the perpetrators of the killing had still not been caught but Hamas seemed to have got the message that killing collaborators was unacceptable. Terrorist actions against Israel, however, continued.

Yussef went further. He appointed a security aide, Lt.-Col. Hamdi Rifi, to the mayor of Jericho, whom it is generally acknowledged runs the city.

Palestinian police spokesman Mohammed Shakr, however, insisted that Rifi "is only helping the mayor enforce regulations."

Yussef also decreed that imams (mosque prayer leaders) could not make political statements during prayer meetings in mosques. But this sweeping edict had to be withdrawn as it seriously antagonized anti-agreement elements and resulted in widespread complaints about resricting freedom of expression.

The message, though, was clear. The Palestinian police were taking control. Riad Al-Malki, spokesman for the anti-agreement Popular Front for the Liberation of Palestine, speculated that Arafat was establishing a military administration in the image of the Israel administration.

Other Palestinians, even those associated with Arafat's Fatah, expressed fears — off the record — that a military-police administration might develop which would be far less liberal and far more draconian than the IDF ever was.

Ironically, the Palestinian fears might offer the best hope for Israel. A powerful police force controlling anti-government elements would probably be the best recipe for maintaining the peace agreement, with Arafat clearly accountable.

Experience biblical life at museum

Jerusalem Dateline

The Ein Yael Living Museum in Jerusalem offers a "hands on" biblical experience. Visitors can create their own mosaics, harvest crops as if they were farmers living 2,000 years ago, practice the ancient crafts of weaving, basketmaking and pottery, and participate in archaeological excavations.

Located in southern Jerusalem's Refaim Valley, Ein Yael is on the site of a beautifully preserved Roman villa replete with bathhouses, attractive mosaic floors, an olive press and aqueducts and reservoirs for irrigating the surrounding fields. The Jerusalem Foundation and the Israel Antiquities Authority restored the estate, capturing as much of the original splendor as possible.

The site now includes a biblical farm in which participants learn to cultivate, harvest and thresh crops using channel irrigation. A highlight of the agricultural year is olive picking and the production of golden olive oil from the site's press. Children especially enjoy milking the goats and helping make goats' cheese.

Ein Yael also features archaeological workshops held in conjunction with experts that immerse visitors into excavating, collecting, washing, classifying and photographing artifacts.

Since its inception several years ago Ein Yael has emerged as a centre for fun, learning and creativity. Time travel is still in the realm of science fiction but Ein Yael's workshops do provide an authentic taste of how it must have felt to live in the biblical era.

Workshops at the Ein Yael Living Museum in Jerusalem offer a taste of life as it was in the biblical era.

So, where did the rabbi really go?

By I. L. PERETZ

Early every Friday morning, at the time of the Penitential Prayers, the Rabbi of Nemirov would vanish.

He was nowhere to be seen — neither in the synagogue, nor in the two Houses of Study, nor at a minyan. He was certainly not at home.

Where could the Rabbi be? Where should he be? In heaven, no doubt. A rabbi has plenty of business to take care of just before the Days of Awe. Jews, God bless them, need livelihood, peace, health. They want to be pious and good, but our sins are so great, and the Satan of the thousand eyes watches the whole earth from one end to the other. What he sees he reports, he denounces, informs. Who can help us if not the Rabbi!

That's what the people thought.

But once a Litvak came, and he laughed. You know the Litvaks. This Litvak points to a passage in the Gemarah, where it is written that even Moses, our Teacher, did not ascend to heaven during his lifetime but remained suspended two and a half feet below. Go argue with a Litvak!

So where can the Rabbi be?

"That's not my business," said the Litvak, shrugging. Yet all the while — what a Litvak can do! — he is scheming to find out.

That same night, right after the evening prayers the Litvak steals into the Rabbi's room, slides under the Rabbi's bed, and waits. He'll watch all night and discover where the Rabbi vanishes and what he does during the Penitential Prayers.

Someone else might have got drowsy and fallen asleep, but a Litvak is never at a loss; he recites a whole tractate of the Talmud by heart.

At dawn he hears the call to prayers.

The Rabbi has already been awake for a long time. The Litvak has heard him groaning for a whole hour.

Whoever has heard the Rabbi of Nemirov groan knows how much sorrow for all Israel, how much suffering, lies in each groan. A man's heart might break, hearing it. But a Litvak is made of iron; he listens and remains unmoved. The Rabbi lies on the bed, and the Litvak under the bed.

Then the Litvak hears the beds in the house begin to creak. He hears people jumping out of their beds, mumbling a few Jewish words, pouring water on their fingernails, banging doors. Everyone has left. It is again quiet and dark; a bit of moonlight shines through the shutters.

Finally the Rabbi, long life to him, arises. First he does what befits a Jew. Then he goes to the clothes closet and takes out a bundle of peasant clothes: linen trousers, high boots, a coat, a big felt hat, and a long wide leather belt studded with brass nails. The Rabbi gets dressed. From his coat pocket dangles the end of a heavy peasant rope.

The Rabbi leaves the room, and the Litvak follows him.

On the way, the Rabbi stops in the kitchen, bends down, takes an axe from under the bed, and leaves the house. The Litvak trembles but continues to follow.

The dead hush of the Days of Awe hangs over the dark streets. Every once in awhile a cry rises from some minyan reciting the Penitential Prayers, or from a sick bed. The Rabbi hugs the sides of the street, keeping in the shade of the houses. He glides from house to house, and the Litvak after him. The Litvak hears the sound of his heartbeats mingling with the sound of the Rabbi's heavy steps. But he keeps on going and follows the Rabbi to the outskirts of town.

A small wood stands behind the town. The Rabbi, long life to him, enters the wood. He takes 30 or 40 steps and stops by a small tree. The Litvak, overcome with amazement, watches the Rabbi take the axe out of his belt and strike the tree. He hears the tree creak and fall. The Rabbi chops the tree into logs and the logs into sticks. Then he makes a bundle of the wood and ties it with the rope in his pocket. He puts the bundle of wood on his back, shoves the axe back into his belt, and returns to the town.

He stops at a back street beside a small broken-down shack and knocks at the window.

"Who is there?" asks a frightened voice. The Litvak recognizes it as the voice of a sick Jewish woman.

"I," answers the Rabbi in the accent of a peasant.

"Who is I?"

Again the Rabbi answers in Russian: "Vassil."

"Who is Vassil, and what do you want?"

"I have wood to sell, very cheap." And, not waiting for the woman's reply, he goes into the house.

The Litvak steals in after him. In the gray light of early morning he sees a small room with broken, miserable furnishings. A sick woman, wrapped in rags, lies on the bed. She complains bitterly. "Buy? How can I buy? Where will a poor widow get money?"

"I'll lend it to you," answers the supposed Vassil. "It's only six pennies."

"And how will I ever pay you back?" says the poor woman, groaning.

"You foolish woman," answers the Rabbi. "See you are a poor sick Jewess, and I am prepared to trust you with a little wood. I'm sure you'll pay. After all, you have such a great and mighty God, and you don't trust Him for six pennies?"

"And who will kindle the fire?" says the widow. "Do I have the strength to get up? My son is at work."

"I'll kindle the fire," answers the Rabbi.

As the Rabbi put the wood into the oven he recited, in a groan, the first portion of the Penitential Prayers.

As he kindled the fire and the wood burned brightly, he continued reciting, a bit more joyously, the second portion of the Penitential Prayers. And when the fire was finally set, he recited the third portion, and then shut the stove.

The skeptical Litvak who saw all this, became a devoted disciple of the Rabbi.

And ever after, when another disciple tells how the Rabbi of Nemirov ascends to heaven at the time of the Penitential Prayers, the Litvak does not laugh. He only adds, quietly: "If Not Still Higher."

This story translated by Dr. Sol Liptzin is from the works of the great Yiddish writer I. L. Peretz. It appears elsewhere in The CJN in Yiddish.

The CJN wishes to note that the comments about Litvakim are Peretz's and do not necessarily reflect our opinion of that inestimable group of Jews.

פון יצחק לייבוש פּרץ

צו דער נעלענהייט פון די ימים נדאים. דזדקן
מיד אינגער די קלאָסישע דערציילונג פון דעם
גרויסן יידישן קינסטלער י. ל. פּרץ. ע"ה.

אָן דער נממיראָער פלעגט סליחות צייט יעדן מרמאָרגן נעלם וועדן, מאָרשוינדן!

— מיין דאנז! — עונטפערט ער און ציט מיט די אַקסל; און תוך כדי דבור (וואָס אַ ליטוואַק קאָן!) איז ער זיך מישב צו דערנינ די זאַך.

פאַרטאָג הערט ער, וויי מען קלאָפּט צו סליחות.

דער רבי איז שוין נישט נעשלאָפן אַ צייט. ער הערט אים שוין אפשר אַ נאַנצע שעה קדעכטן.

עמלעך, שטייט דער רבי, זאָל לעבן, אויף. . .

פון דער קעשענע, פון סיפּורמיצע, שטאַרט אַרויס אַן עק פון נראָבן שמורק. . . דער רבי נייט אַרויס; דער ליטוואַק — נאָר!

אין אַ היטערגעסל שטעלט ער זיך אַפּ ביי אַן אָרעם, אַלט אייגנבראָכן היימל און קלאַפּט אין אין סענצטערל.

— וועד איז? — פרעגט מען דערשראָרקן פון שמוב אַרויס. דער ליטוואַק דערקענט, אַז עס איז אַ קול פון אַ יידענע, פון אַ קראַנקער יידענע.

—אַז! — ענטפערט דער רבי אויף פּויערישע לשון.

— קטא אַז? — פרעגט מען וויייטער פון שמוב.

און דער רבי ענטפערט וויייטער אויף מאַלאָרוסיש לשון: האַסל.

— וואָס פאַר אַ וואַסל און וואָס וויילסמ, וואַסל?

— האַלץ, זאָגט דער פּאַרשטעלטער וואַסל, האָב איך צו פאַרקויפן! זייער בילק. . . בחצי חנם האַלץ! און נים וואַרטמיק אויף אַ חשובה, נעמט עס זיך אין שמוב אַרייַן.

— קוינן? מיט וואָס זאָל איך קוינן? וואו האָב איך, אַרעמע אלמנה, נעלט?

— איך וועל דיר באַרגן! ענטפערט דער פאַר-שטעלטער וואַסיל. אין נאָנען וועקס נראָשן.

— פון וואַנען וועל איך דיר באַצאָלן? קרעכצט די אַרעמע יידענע.

— נאָרישע מענטש — מוטרס זי דער רבי, — זע, דו ביסט אַן אַרעמע קראַנקע יידענע און איך נעמדי דיר דאָס ביסל האַלץ, איך בין בטוח, אַז די וועסט באַצאָלן; און די, דו האָסט אוא שטאַרקן, נרויסן באָם, און נעמדיסט אים נים. . . און האָסט אויף אים, אויף נאַרישע וועקס נראָשן פאַרן ביסל האַלץ, קיין במחון נישט!

— און וועס מיר איינזיצן? קרעכצט די אלמנה — איך האָב דען כוח אויפצושטיין? מין זון איז אויף דער אַרבעט נעבליבן!

— איך וועל דיר איינהייצן אויך, זאָגט דער רבי.

און אַריינלייצנדיק דאָס האַלץ אין אויפן, האָט דער רבי קרעכצנדיק נעזאָגט פון סליחות דעם ערשטן פּזמון. . .

דעם דרייטן פּזמון האָט עד נעזאָגט, וועו עס האָט זיך אויפנעברענט.

דער ליטוואַק, האָט האָט דאָס אַלץ נעזונן, איז שוין נעבליבן אַ נממיראָער חסיד.

און שפּעטער, אויב אַ חסיד האָט אַמאָל דערציילט, אַז דער נממיראָער האָבט זיך אויף סליחות-צייט יעדן פּרימאָרגן, און מליט אַרויף אין הימל אַריין, פלעגט שוין דער ליטוואַק נים לאָכן, נאָר צוגעבן שטילער-היים:

— אויב נישט נאָך העכער!

Chernobyl children adjust to life in Israel

In a symbolic gesture of hope and commitment, the Children of Chernobyl celebrate the arrival of the 1001st child to Israel with the release of 1001 balloons over Jerusalem's Independence Park. June 1994. [WZPS photo]

World Zionist Press Service

Three elfin Russian girls, aged six to seven, cluster at the doors of Beit Rivka, a state religious school in Kfar Habad, a town populated by Lubavitch Chassidim and situated 15 minutes south of Tel Aviv.

Shepherded by their teacher, a woman in a pert wig, the troika moves inseparably, practically tumbling over each other, toward the door to catch the bus "home."

In Israel only three months, they know enough Hebrew to shriek "chocolate ice cream" when asked what their favorite dessert is.

Their childish merriness camouflages a lot.

No matter how determinedly upbeat their smiling teacher may be and how worldly the little girls themselves are, their aloneness, their utter dependence on the kindness of strangers, is palpable.

Like children who get in the way of other peoples' bullets and wars, the girls' respective childhoods have been subject to the vagaries of nuclear fallout. In their case, it was 90 tons of radioactive material containing 20-40 million curies of radiation which came raining down on the citizens of Chernobyl in 1986.

Today, "home" for the three little Russians is a continent away from their mothers and fathers who remain in the contaminated hometown of Gomel in Belarus.

The girls are among the over 1,000 Jewish children of Chernobyl (aged six to 16) whom the Chabad organization has airlifted to Israel in a unique humanitarian medical relief program started in 1990.

"The program started," says the program's director Yossie Raichik, "at the behest of parents living in the contaminated areas who realized that their children were becoming ill. They were getting increasingly desperate because they knew they were fighting a time bomb; that the prevention of disease and malignancy was possible but not available. They could not cope with the financial or emotional burden of treatment and appealed for help to a myriad of Jewish organizations — including Chabad — all of which declined to help."

The parents them approached Rabbi Yitzchok Kogan of Leningrad, a longtime Chabad rabbi who took the request directly to the late Rabbi Menachem Mendel Schneerson, the Lubavitcher Rebbe.

"The Rebbe saw the need," said Rabbi Kogan, "perceived the situation and responded immediately in the affirmative. These people had to be helped. There was a suggestion to bring the children to the U.S. but the Rebbe said, 'Kfar Habad and on a permament basis, with their parents to follow.' The directive was given and the program was launched."

When the first group of 196 Chernobyl children arrived in Israel, Kfar Habad was ready with two newly established outpatient clinics, a dental clinic, dormitory arrangements, freshly painted classrooms staffed with Russian speaking teachers and a staff of psychologists.

After a battery of tests were administered, 15 per cent of the children in the initial six groups of arrivals were found to be suffering from growth retardation; 28 per cent of the boys and 42 per cent of the girls had enlarged thyroids; and 50 per cent of the children had enlarged cervical lymph nodes.

One boy, who later died, arrived with chronic myeloid leukemia and received a bone marrow transplant at Hadassah Hospital. Nearly half the children suffered from xerophthalmia, dry eye syndrome.

If the Chernobyl accident caused the world to hold its collective breath, it was with good reason. At Hiroshima, 95 per cent of the nuclear material contained radioactive isotopes (species of atoms with nearly identical chemical behavior) with extremely short half-lives (the time required for half of the atoms of a radioactive substance to disintegrate). The city was repopulated three years after the A-bomb was dropped.

By contrast, most of the isotopes in the Chernobyl fallout would have extremely long half-lives. For example strontium — 29-90 years and caesium — 30-137 years.

A 1994 study by the World Health Organization published a report which confirmed experts' fears about the long-term effects of exposure to radioactivity. The report indicated an alarming rise of a deadly form of thyroid cancer amongst the children who lived in the region immediately north of the reactor — the first place hit by the radioactive clouds. The culprit, radioactive iodine which settled in the grass, was then consumed by cows who concentrated it in their milk.

In Israel the children have received what Raichik calls "pro-active intervention," including a regimen of beta carotene vitamins, to arrest the effects of radiation.

"There is no need for a tragedy," notes Jay Litvin who coordinates Kfar Habad's activities with the Chabad Brooklyn office.

"Research indicates that there is no radiation-related sickness that cannot be mitigated or at least severely retarded by early treatment. These diseases include leukemia, cancer, blindness, hormonal imbalance, diseases of the reproductive systems, skin carcinoma, abnormal bone formation, diseases of the blood marrow, to name a few. Being high risk, these children need constant observation and evaluation on a minimal four month basis for early detection of these disease syndromes."

The Kfar Habad program has borne a cornucopia of fruit.

Some 600 children have been reunited with their parents in Israel. (Every parent who sends a child to Israel under the program makes a written commitment to come on aliyah within two years.)

And, most important, the children are doing well. A fist-sized tumor was removed from the brain of 12-year-old David Byteman; David Zilchenko, 9, who suffered from an obscure pancreatic disease, has been cured; Yula Nyesenko, 12, and her brother Alex, 11, who arrived with swollen thyroids and severe anemia have, according to Kfar Habad resident physician Dr. Masha Shvartmann, "improved remarkably after only a few months of eating well and taking vitamins."

The cost of $17,000 per child per year, has not deterred the Habadniks who see in their endeavor the divine principle of saving of life. Eleven airlifts, subsidized in large part by the late Jerome Schottenstein, an Ohio-based philanthropist, have brought the children to Israel. The film producer Steven Spielberg has also been a benefactor of the program.

Parental financial participation in the venture is nil. "Many of these children come from socio-economically deprived homes," notes Raichik, "and many of them arrive malnourished. Parents are afraid to purchase fruits and vegetables fearing contamination and most do not have the means to purchase expensive imported food. It's a vicious cycle of poverty. So while the kids are homesick it's limited to their parents, not to their former physical surroundings or conditions."

Today in Minsk alone, over 200 kilometres from the epicentre, more than 7,000 children are reported to have leukemia. The towns of Mozyr and Gomel, where most of the Chernobyl children originate from, are less than 100 kilometres from the epicentre.

"We have lists with the names of 3,000 children," says Raichik. "We are pushing hard to act now and bring the others out. But the financial burden is enormous. Everybody is off in their own corner for their own little reason. Our agenda is and has always been the kids."

"The degree of responsibility we have taken upon ourselves," adds Judy Kirschenbaum of the Chabad movement in Israel, "is enormous. You think it's a responsibility to invite a child to your home for the weekend.

"Chabad has 'invited' over 1,000 children for an indefinite period of time. Their food, clothing, education, special medical care and supervision, plus the millions of other details like their dental bills, manners, teenageitis and happiness — it's all in our lap. We encourage though do not push religious observance. That's not the goal. Saving the actual lives of the children was a top priority of the late Rebbe. Period."

Education for women has a long history

By LEO DAVIDS
Special to The CJN

In her book, And All Your Children Shall Be Learned, Dr. Shoshana Zolty has produced a very substantial work, containing nine chapters spread over some three hundred pages, plus a long bibliography, detailed index, preface and afterword.

The book covers the full span of Jewish history and discusses (as the subtitle tells us) Women and the Study of Torah in Jewish Law and History.

Zolty deals with theoretical and philosophical writings about women's Torah study, whether certain sectors of traditional Jewish learning are open or closed to women and related matters. Most of the chapters in the book are historical reviews of data indicating the extent and nature of Torah study by Jewish women.

The later parts of the book speculate on where female access to Torah study, particularly of Talmudic and halachic texts, may be going in the future.

If one were to attempt a brief overview of the overall thesis of the book, it is that: a) Correct fulfilment of mitzvot (Torah Commandments) requires substantial knowledge to guide practice, so that it is obviously impossible to bar any group of Jews from Torah study yet expect them to carry out the mitzvot properly.

b) Furthermore, Jewish women have recently expanded their participation in Torah study even in theoretical areas (sometimes referred to as Torah Lishmah, or Torah studied for its own sake), rather than to answer practical questions.

c) Finally, the book points out that some of the greatest Torah authorities of the past 30 years have clearly accepted full access to the Talmudic and halachic literature by women, and therefore that women who seek a deeper knowledge of the traditional texts should have every support and assistance to proceed in such studies.

Although the main focus of the book is on women studying classic texts of the Oral Law, it also deals with practically all aspects of women in Judaism, including obligations that women do and do not have in regard to various mitzvot; women serving as prayer leaders; women in the rabbinic courts; problems of get and agunah; and other matters far beyond questions of studying texts.

Although it is impossible to do a thorough job on all of these issues in one book, it is true that one has to touch on these matters in some serious way, in order to understand discussions around access for women to the Torah Sheb'al Peh (the Oral Law).

Chapter 9, which is the last historical chapter in the book, deals with the beginnings and development of the Beth Jacob movement, which essentially seals the public acceptance of education for Jewish girls and young women within the Orthodox Jewish mainstream.

The history of increasing Torah study by women is essentially capped by the tale of how Sarah Schenirer convinced the leadership of Agudas Israel that formal Jewish schooling for girls had to be instituted and should be fully supported by the Torah-true authorities of the day.

By promptly receiving support from the great Polish Jewish leader, the Rebbe of Ger, Sarah Schenirer was able to quickly plant the Beth Jacob idea throughout Europe and eventually on this continent as well.

Zolty demonstrates that several of the leading authorities in American Jewry during the 1970s and '80s accepted the propriety of full Talmudic and halachic study by women, and made specific arrangements to facilitate such a study. She refers to support of this position by the late Rebbe of Lubavitch as well as by the spiritual authority of Yeshiva University, and therefore of centrist American Orthodoxy, the late Rabbi J.B. Soloveitchik.

The question that she and we may well ask, therefore, is what brought these great thinkers to the conclusion that study by women should be accepted as appropriate and in full consonance with tradition, when earlier generations had predominantly believed that Torah study by women had to be limited to the non-halachic literature?

Further, given the famous statement against women's Torah study by the Talmudic sage Rabbi Eliezer, which the book quotes and on which opposition to women's Torah Sheb'al Peh study was based, how can we respectfully remember that dictum today and yet apparently disregard its application?

The key to a changing attitude about full-scale Torah study by women, which no doubt underlies the much more encouraging or lenient perspective of recent generations, is the massive historical reality of emancipation and enlightenment.

As becomes very clear on analyzing the challenges that European Orthodoxy began to face when modernity reached Poland, Hungary, Romania, and other countries (a considerable time after it had swept through Western and Central Europe), there was a tremendous change in access to worldly or secular knowledge by women, as modernity means universal literacy through public or equivalent schooling. That is, modern governments educate both boys and girls for functioning in modern society.

The result of this educational revolution was a massive discrepancy between the general or secular knowledge available to Jewish women, and their knowledge of traditional Torah texts. Thus, the larger society made all of its literature available to everyone, while Jewish culture said that its sacred literature was fully available to men but not to women.

If a discrepancy of this kind continues for very long, one need not be a genius to guess which of those two cultures and literatures will attract and involve Jewish women.

It is this change in external circumstances that made it necessary to accommodate reality by opening up all of the traditional Jewish texts to study by women, thus encouraging the women not to turn their backs on Torah study but to engage in it.

Overall, Zolty has provided a very convincing account of Torah Lishmah by women in the past; has given some indication about Torah study today by women in Jerusalem, New York and other centres; and has described the general acceptance of serious textual study by women in most circles now.

Of course, this acceptance of Talmudic and halachic study by women has not reached ultra-Orthodox communities as yet, but Zolty speculates that the attitude there may also change when modernity begins to impact even on the chassidic communities.

Anyone interested in fundamental questions regarding Jewish education would be well served by reading this important book on issues that will remain central in the Orthodox community for years to come.

Na'aleh 16 outreach helps to bring youth to Israel

World Zionist Press Service

Since 1992, both the Jewish Agency and the Israel Ministry of Education have been developing extensive outreach programs — Aliya 16 and Na'aleh — which together have brought over 2,000 teenagers from the former Soviet Union to Israel.

In February 1994, the coordinating committee of the Jewish Agency and the Israel Government decided to unite the two programs and increase the scope of its activities. Thus Na'aleh 16 was born.

"We see the program as an historic opportunity to bring . . . youngsters to Israel, educate them and expose them to Jewish and Zionist values and to Israeli cultural and social life," said Eli Amir, director general of the Youth Aliya Department. Youth Aliya, he continued, sees Na'aleh 16 as a natural continuation of its own work in bringing Jewish youth to Israel over the past 60 years.

The students coming on Na'aleh 16 are 15 to 17 and study in a one-, two- or three-year track, depending on their age, until they matriculate. They can choose the residential institution best suited to their needs, whether it be a Youth Aliya village, a kibbutz or a religious educational institution. Academic, technological, maritime, musical and sporting tracks are open to the students and they are also encouraged to develop their own spheres of excellence in these areas.

Leaders in the government and the Jewish Agency both believe that these young people are the natural catalysts for their families' future aliyah. By providing a positive experience and helping the students decide on a course of study, the program's founders hope to encourage the parents to overcome their own doubts and fears and consider starting a new life in Israel.

One of the big draws of Na'aleh 16 is the fact that the youth come to Israel as tourists, not as new immigrants. Therefore, they are not obligated to commit themselves to Israel at the outset. This helps assuage parents' fears and gives the young people more time to decide whether or not they want to make aliyah.

So far, according to Menachem Yavor, director of aliyah for the Ministry of Education, only six of the 1,000 youngsters who have come on Na'aleh 16 have returned home.

"We knew that many of these kids had a negative image of Israel," he said. "We thought that when they went home for the summer vacation, many would think twice about returning. Fortunately we were wrong."

A massive infrastructure is needed to reach and screen the thousands of young adults and their families throughout the C.I.S. But with the Jewish Agency's large network of emissaries, the Ministry of Education's teachers' network and the assistance of the Israel Embassy, youth in widely scattered Jewish communities are reached with relative ease.

The program is publicized through state-run media — unheard of only a few years ago — as well as through newspaper advertising, flyers, video films of current participants and radio.

In order to qualify for Na'aleh 16, students must have a higher than average achievement level; they must show enough maturity to cope with separation from their parents; they must be free of behavioral problems, have a basic Jewish identity and be eligible under the Law of Return. For this reason, all candidates are screened in the former Soviet Union by a Russian-speaking professional team headed by a senior Israeli psychologist.

The selection process includes tests in mathematics, English and reading comprehension; four IQ tests; four personality tests; a personal interview; and an interview with the applicants' parents.

Once chosen for the program, students participate in a summer camp in the C.I.S., where they engage in intensive Hebrew study. In Israel, they continue with their Hebrew studies while attending regular classes with Israeli youth.

Those with minimal Jewish and Zionist education attend special conventional and extra-curricular Jewish educational programs, including Jewish history, traditions and culture. In addition, their Jewish identity is reinforced by having them experience Jewish holidays and Sabbath with volunteer host families and visit significant Jewish historical sites.

At the Isaac and Naomi Kaplan Academy for Sciences in Herzliya, Katia Vashenko, like many of her Russian friends studying at the Academy, is an only child. Though Katia's mother, who is divorced, dearly misses her, she supported Katia's decision to participate in Na'aleh.

"I came to study," says Katia, a soft-spoken, intelligent girl. "The education in Israel is good and with the political unrest in the Ukraine, no one knows what the future will hold."

Similarly, Slavek Hafez, who came on Aliya 16 from Kazakhstan, left his mother, father (the only Jewish doctor in the region), and younger sister to come to Israel. Living in a city with a population of 300,000 and only 50 Jewish families, Slavek had never seen a synagogue, knew no practising Jews and did not celebrate the Jewish holidays.

"I read many books about Israel in English," said Slavek. "I knew, even before I met the people from Aliya 16, that I wanted to graduate high school in Israel and study at the prestigious Technion in Haifa."

"It was very difficult at first," said Laurena Todes from Lithuania, "but we got a lot of support from our teachers and the staff at our school. Many of them speak Russian and understand what we're going through.

"In a way it's a paradox," she continued. "We want to be here to learn and study, but we also want to be back home with our families. It's like being pulled in two different directions and it can sometimes be very confusing."

To help students overcome family separation, the program ensures that they keep in touch with their parents through visits home, as well as arranged parental visits to Israel. In addition, contact is maintained by letters, telephone calls and assessment cards prepared by the educational institution.

Na'aleh 16 plans to bring 5,000 students to Israel for the 1994-95 academic year. The total cost will be $32 million, according to the Jewish Agency.

Eli Weichselbaum in a classroom at the Zwi Perez Chajes School. [Sheldon Kirshner]

Re-opening of school in Vienna is a symbol of reborn Jewish community

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
CJN Staff Reporter

Rabbi Zwi Perez Chajes would be proud.

More than 50 years after it was closed and converted into a collecting point for Viennese Jews being deported to Auschwitz, the school that is named in his honor is once again a vital institution.

One of several Jewish schools in Vienna, the Zwi Peres Chajes School is a living, breathing symbol of the Jewish community's determination to press ahead, notwithstanding the depravations and tragedies it endured after Austria was annexed by Nazi Germany in 1938.

Located in the Second District, where large numbers of Jews resided before World War II, the school was reopened in 1979, but has been in its present building since 1984.

For Vienna — which has a registered Jewish population of slightly more than 7,000 — it is unique.

First, it's the only school with a distinct Zionist orientation.

Second, it boasts of a mixed Orthodox and secular enrolment, a rather rare phenomenon.

About two-thirds of its 350 students, aged 2-18, are of Soviet origin. Most of the Soviet children are in the lower grades, reflecting the fact that the majority of Soviet immigrants in Vienna are of child-bearing age.

The children from the Bukharan region in Central Asia, who comprise something like half of the Soviet students, have a fairly good Jewish background. The rest do not, says the principal, Eli Weichselbaum. As he puts it, "They start from the beginning."

Academically, the Soviet students excel. But they have problems integrating into a Western milieu.

Not surprisingly, all 10 teachers in the Jewish studies program are Israelis. They usually don't stay too long, though one couple has been there for a decade.

Weichselbaum, also an Israeli, looks exactly like a stereotypical kibbutznik. In actuality, he's from Tel Aviv, where he was an educator. German is his mother tongue, his parents having been Berliners before they emigrated to what was then Palestine.

Although he was raised in an observant household, he is not religious himself. Nevertheless, he wears a yarmulke, keeps kosher and observes the Sabbath.

Weichselbaum doesn't appear to be someone who enjoys rocking the boat. But as a committed Zionist, he never tires of telling the students that they have no future in the Diaspora. Parents are not happy with his espousal of aliyah, which is negligible in any case. But he stands his ground. "This is the price they pay for my presence here."

Zwi Perez Chajes, a framed portrait of whom hangs in Weichselbaum's airy office, was a dedicated Zionist. A rabbi and a scholar, he was born in Brody, Galicia, in 1876. A child prodigy, he graduated from the University of Vienna, taught Hebrew at the University of Florence, then led a congregation in Trieste.

In 1918, nine years before his untimely death, he returned to Vienna as deputy to Chief Rabbi Moritz Guedemann, whom he eventually succeeded. Rabbi Chajes commanded respect, but his unreconstructed Zionist views were generally unpopular, not only with acculturized Jews but with Orthodox Jews.

He was not deterred by the antagonism, and, given his interest in education, went on to establish or revive two elementary schools as well as the school which bears his name today.

After the Anschluss in 1938, the Jewish community was subjected to unbearable pressures by Austria's new German masters. And not long afterward, the Zwi Perez Chajes Schule, as it is officially called, was shut by the authorities. In the early 1940s, when Austria's Jewish community was liquidated by the Nazis, it was put to use as a deportation centre.

Today, 15 years after its phoenix-like resurrection and wholesale renovation, the school is growing. A new section was added two years ago, and further expansion plans are in the offing.

Rabbi Chajes would doubtless be pleased.

Cards a holiday tradition

World Zionist Press Service

Rosh Hashanah, the Jewish New Year, is the traditional time for sending greeting cards wishing a "good year" (shanah tovah) to family and friends.

While it is possible to draw parallels between this custom and that of sending Christmas/New Year cards, Rosh Hashanah greetings have distinctive Jewish roots dating back more than 500 years.

"The sending of Rosh Hashanah greetings is an Ashkenazi custom of long standing," says Jerusalem Rabbi Shlomo Pappenheim, a noted collector and authority on Judaica. He cites the 14th century Rabbi Shalom of Neustadt as being the first to admonish his followers to include a blessing for the New Year in their regular correspondence.

But it was Rabbi Shalom's student, the Maharil, Rabbi Yaakov Molin (1355-1427) of the Rhineland, who firmly established the custom.

"He was truly the mentor of the modern-day Rosh Hashanah greeting," says Rabbi Daniel Sperber, head of the Judith and Gershon Leiber Centre for Jewish Art at Bar-Ilan University in Tel Aviv. "He wrote that from Elul (the month before Rosh Hashanah) through Yom Kippur (the Day of Atonement), when writing a letter, wishes for a good year should be included."

The exact greeting was "May you be inscribed and sealed for a good year."

This phrase is from the Festival Prayerbook and refers to the belief that during this period one's fate for the coming year is inscribed and sealed in one of three books. The wish is that inscription will be in the Book of Life.

"But there are always those who want to improve on things and soon people started writing letters for the express purpose of sending Rosh Hashanah greetings."

The custom spread throughout the Ashkenazi Jewish communities, especially those in Central Europe, reaching Eastern Europe somewhat later. Sephardi Jews did not begin sending Rosh Hashanah greetings until the early 20th century.

Modern printed Rosh Hashanah cards first appeared in Germany around 1837. These early cards were printed in gold on double sheets of white paper, with plenty of room for handwritten messages.

Coincidentally, this was about the same time that non-Jewish New Year cards began appearing in Germany, Switzerland and Austria.

In Victorian England, Raphael Tuck, an Orthodox Jew, became famous for his high-quality, artistic Christmas cards. By the turn of the century, he had also ventured into the Rosh Hashanah card business.

Most Judaica scholars frankly admit that the subject has not been researched enough to determine whether Jewish Rosh Hashanah cards were the impetus for non-Jewish New Year cards or vice versa.

Tel Aviv graphic artist David Tartakover, who has an extensive collection of printed Rosh Hashanah cards, believes that the Jewish custom grew out of the Christian one. "It is not a Jewish custom to send greeting cards. Many of the early cards have graphic elements, such as three-dimensional fold-outs, which were definitely influenced by non-Jewish cards," he says.

Rabbi Pappenheim, on the other hand, firmly believes that "Jews started this custom. For Jews, the period before the New Year is a time of repentance leading up to the Day of Judgment. For non-Jews, it is not. In my studies, I have found that in the relationship between Jewish and non-Jewish customs, the Jews initiate the spiritual side of a custom, while the non-Jews develop its artistic side. Here, too, we find this, with Jews being influenced by non-Jewish artistic developments with respect to New Year cards."

The big breakthrough in printed, commercial greeting cards came at the end of the 19th century, according to Dr. Shalom Sabar of the Hebrew University's Department of Art and Centre for Jewish Art.

"The custom became very popular," he said, "especially in Eastern Europe, with Russian Jewish immigrants bringing it to America. These early greeting cards would be saved and later hung in the sukkah for decoration during Sukkot."

Rosh Hashanah cards have always reflected the aspirations, hopes and lifestyles of the Jews sending them. Late 19th century German cards tended to be elaborate, with gilt-edged layers — giving concrete expression to the material values of German Jewry. Those produced during the same period for Eastern European or American Jewry often focused on immigration.

"We have cards from the early 20th century showing Miss Liberty receiving Eastern European Jews to America with a shanah tovah," Sabar notes. "In the Jewish Museum in New York, there is a card sent in 1912 by a Jewish couple from Alaska which has its shanah tovah greeting carved on a walrus tusk, obviously done by an Eskimo artist for the pair."

A World War II card, printed by the United States Army and sent via V-mail, shows an American-Jewish soldier blowing the shofar. Early Zionists used scenes from Eretz Yisrael. Yeshivot would send cards depicting the holy places as a means of fundraising.

With the establishment of the State of Israel, David Ben-Gurion, kibbutzniks and agriculture became popular images.

Sabar even found cards from the early 1960s with Elvis Presley. Following the Six Day War, Yitzhak Rabin, Moshe Dayan, the Western Wall and the Israel Defence Forces came into vogue. Other Israeli leaders, including Golda Meir and Menachem Begin, also have graced Rosh Hashanah cards.

Over the past few years, there has been a return to more traditional symbols — the shofar, the Torah, biblical illustrations.

"The cards have become more commercial, less folk art, and for me, less interesting," says Sabar.

But they are certainly more in keeping with what Rabbi Yaacov Molin might have expected a Rosh Hashanah greeting card to look like.

German school symbol of Jewish continuity

Reporting from eastern Berlin, Sheldon Kirshner visits the first Jewish secondary school in Germany since the Nazi era.

By SHELDON KIRSHNER

The Judische Gymnasium on Great Hamburger Street is back again.

Times do change.

After 1942, the school was used as a transit point from which Jews were shipped to concentration camps like Auschwitz and Theresienstadt.

Today, almost 50 years after the collapse of Nazi Germany, it is a vibrant symbol of Jewish continuity in Germany.

"The school," said its principal, Uwe Mull, "is a sign that the Jewish community is here to stay."

The Judische Gymnasium, which opened a year ago, also sends a message to Germans. "We want the school to encourage the principles of tolerance and integration," explained Mull, a Protestant.

In line with the credo set out by its original and principal founder, the Jewish philosopher Moses Mendelssohn (1729-1786), the school is designed for Jewish and non-Jewish children.

Approximately one-third of its 30 pupils, aged 13 to 15, are Christians, including Mull's daughter, and they all take Jewish religious classes.

The formula suits Jerzy Kanal, chair of Berlin's Jewish community, just fine. As he put it: "Prejudice can only disappear by getting to know one another."

Kanal's philosophy is particularly timely now, when right-wing radicalism — with its attendant anti-Semitism — is flaring in Germany.

Since its establishment in 1778, the Judische Gymnasium has gone through several phases.

Initially, it was a private Jewish boys' academy, reflecting Mendelssohn's theory of enlightenment, the purpose of which was to encourage the integration of Jews into German society.

Less than 50 years later, it was opened to non-Jews. During the Weimar republic, the school was one of many supported by Berlin's 180,000 Jews. Closed in 1942, following Hitler's momentous decision to annihilate European Jewry on a systematic basis, it was converted into a vocational school by the then East German government.

In 1989, when communist East Germany was well into its death throes, the authorities let it be known that the building housing the vocational school would be returned to the tiny Jewish community in what was then East Berlin.

The building — which is opposite a wine pub and adjacent to a Protestant church — was officially given back to the Jewish community following the unification of East and West Germany in 1990.

With the assistance of the federal government, renovation of the school was undertaken in March 1992. In a well-publicized ceremony, the gymnasium was officially opened last August.

The neighborhood in which it's located, Oranienburg, was once known as the Scheunenviertel. Before the Nazi era, it was home to poor Polish and Russian Jews.

Today, yet again, Russian Jews are moving into the vicinity. According to Mull, 13 of his students were born in the former Soviet Union.

Uwe Mull stands in front of Berlin's Jewish secondary school, next to a plaque dedicated to its original founder, the philosopher Moses Mendelssohn. [Frank Schroder]

All students receive five hours of instruction per week in Jewish history, Judaism and Hebrew, taught by three teachers imported from Israel. Eight non-Jewish teachers instruct the pupils in general subjects like geography and German literature. Next year, a Jewish specialist in mathematics and physics from the old Soviet Union will be hired.

Upwards of one-quarter of the eligible Jewish students in Berlin attend the Judische Gymnasium, and the majority of those are graduates of the Jewish elementary school, which has been in existence for eight years.

Parents are asked to pay DM 400 a month in tuition, but the Jewish community assists students who cannot afford it.

The school, which already has a kosher kitchen, is currently being expanded. Ten new classrooms, plus computer rooms and science labs, are planned.

When construction is finished later this year to coincide with the new academic year, the student body will increase to about 250 by admitting students up to the age of 19.

Mull, a graduate of the Technical University in Braunschweig, is a high school teacher by profession. Forty-three years old, he was born in Salzgitter, a town founded by the Nazi regime as an industrial centre. His father, who he says was apolitical, served in the Wehrmacht on the Eastern front.

As might be expected in a town without Jews, Mull grew up practically ignorant of Jewish religion and tradition. But since he valued Judeo-Christian ethics, and believed in tolerance and in the idea of a multicultural society, he decided to send his daughter to the Jewish elementary school in Berlin.

It was there, as president of the parents' organization, that he was asked to draw up plans for the Judische Gymnasium. Since then, he has been intimately involved with its development.

Mull's contract comes up for renewal in 1996, but he hopes the board will let him carry on well into the next century.

Israeli music program abandons formality as it nurtures soloists

Jerusalem Dateline

Once a year, half a dozen well-known concert violinists and outstanding music professors from different countries gather together with 30 to 40 gifted young string students from around the world for a two-week master class held in an Israeli kibbutz in the Galilee, Kibbutz Eilon.

While there are thousands of master classes for promising young musicians, none are quite like the Keshet Eilon Mastercourse, now entering its fifth year.

At most international master classes, teachers and students live apart, meeting only for lessons and rehearsals. In the Kesher Eilon program, all participants take their meals in the kibbutz's communal dining hall and jointly enjoy such amenities as the swimming pool and club house.

Furthermore, the Kesher Eilon curriculum includes archery lessons, where teachers and students often participate together — as students.

In such an atmosphere it is not surprising that the young people in their teens and early twenties don't call their teachers maestro as is customary in most places, but simply call them by their first names.

The lack of formality is a genuine reflection of the Keshet Eilon curriculum, which offers an individualized, relatively unstructured program. It allows plenty of time to practise between lesssons, as well as time for relaxation and socializing, a rarity in many master class programs.

The main focus at Keshet Eilon is on nurturing future soloists. The teachers work not only on technique, but also on stage presence — development of an individual style and freedom of expression, body language, and establishment of rapport with the audience — all essential elements for a solo string artist.

Every student is given an opportunity to study face to face with an outstanding violinist, but also to gain "solo hours" on stage, appearing before an audience in small halls and in open-air concerts in the kibbutz and surrounding localities.

More than a dozen concerts are held during the 16-day course. Gaining experience on stage is not only a matter of dealing with stage fright and developing stage presence; it is also learning to cope with distractions in the audience or unexpected mishaps on stage without going to pieces.

Faculty members at Keshet Eilon also conduct an open panel discussion each year where the masters candidly share their experiences with their students, sharing small tricks of the trade, personal observations and anecdotes that may help young soloists get over hurdles and survive setbacks in their careers.

In addition to a series of master classes with the maestros themselves, Keshet Eilon also holds a rather unorthodox class with a master violin-maker and a master bow-maker.

Gifted musicians who play violins do not always understand why their instrument responds as it does. At a makeshift workshop, the two artisans not only make minor repairs, but also explain to students how to protect their instruments from damage.

One of the most innovative aspects of the Keshet Eilon program involves archery lessons with an Olympic-calibre archery coach. These stem from a theory supported by such outstanding artists as Israeli violinist Shlomo Mintz and Italian virtuoso Andrea Cappelletti that there is a unique interaction between playing the violin and shooting arrows, one that aids in the development of good violinists.

The faculty hope to test this theory systematically by eventually incorporating archery into the string curriculum at one of Israel's academies.

An Italian menu ...

By LESLYE MICHLIN BORDEN
Special to The CJN

Every year, I spend a lot of time planning my menu for Rosh Hashanah.

This year my task was easier than usual because my husband and I went to Italy recently. There we experienced foods and dishes wonderful enough to select for our Rosh Hashanah menu.

In addition, we learned about the Jewish community in Italy, which for the most part, comprised neither Ashkenazim (Jews from Eastern Europe) nor Sephardim (Jews who were exiled from Spain in 1492). They are Italim, Jews who have lived in Italy continuously since the fall of the Second Temple in the year 70.

In addition, I opted for an Italian menu for health considerations. Doctors and nutritionists for a long time have noticed that people in Mediterranean climates live longer and have lower incidence of heart problems and cancer.

The Mediterranean diet depends far more on olive oil than on fat from animal sources. Olive oil is much lower in saturated fat than other kinds of fat (except canola oil) and there seems to be a correlation between high intake of saturated fat and high cholesterol, and between high cholesterol and increased heart problems.

A second reason health experts offer in favor of a Mediterranean diet is that people there drink more red wine. They think certain components of red wine may contribute to lower blood cholesterol levels. Of course, relaxing over a glass of wine at a meal goes a long way to reducing stress, and this in turn helps to prevent heart problems.

A third explanation is that the Mediterranean diet relies heavily on foods at the bottom of the food pyramid: vegetables, grains, and fruit. Nutritionists, the U.S. Department of Health and Human Services, and the American Cancer Association now recommend a diet higher in these foods and lower in foods closer to the top of the pyramid, such as those from animal sources and all kinds of fats.

My Italian Rosh Hashanah menu achieves these goals: carbohydrates make up about 60 per cent of total calories, protein accounts for 25 per cent, and only 14 per cent of the entire menu comes from fat.

Serve an Italian feast for Rosh Hashanah. Your friends and family will love the experience of the new and unusual dishes. The menu may stimulate conversation about Jewish life and history. And you will be setting a healthy example, one that you and your family can follow for the rest of the year, one that emphasizes your hope to be inscribed in the book of life. L'Shanah Tovah Tikateivu."

LOW FAT, NO CHOLESTEROL ITALIAN CHALLAH CROWN

2 packets dry yeast
2 tbsp. sugar
¼ cup honey
1 tbsp. salt
1½ cups very warm water (about 110 degrees)
Up to 7 cups unbleached white flour
¼ cup olive oil
¾ cup no-fat egg substitute (equivalent to 3 eggs)
1 tbsp. fresh rosemary, chopped
½ cup golden seedless raisins, optional
1 egg white

In a large ceramic mixing bowl, combine the yeast, sugar, honey, and salt with 1½ cups of water. Stir well. Add 2 cups of flour and mix thoroughly. Cover with a clean, damp towel. Set aside in a draft free place until the batter starts to bubble, usually in about 1 hour.

Add the oil, egg substitute, rosemary, raisins (if used), and enough of the remaining flour to make the dough workable. Rub some of the remaining flour into your pastry cloth. Place the dough on the floured cloth. To aid kneading, cover the dough with part of the cloth. Knead through the cloth. This way, you will use less flour and your bread will be light and have a wonderful texture. Knead until the dough is smooth and elastic, about 10 minutes.

Wash out the bowl in which you mixed the dough. Dry it carefully and spray the inside with vegetable oil spray. Or wipe out the inside with a paper towel moistened with olive oil. Place the kneaded dough into the greased bowl. Cover with a clean, damp towel and let rise in a warm place, free from drafts, until the dough doubles in size, at least 1½ hours.

Spray 2 8-inch cake pans with vegetable oil spray. Line them with waxed paper, cut to fit the pans, and spray again.

When the dough has risen, punch it down and turn out onto the pastry cloth. Knead it gently, to remove air pockets. Then divide into two equal parts. Put one half back into the bowl and cover while you are working with the other half.

Shape one piece into a rope about 18-inches long. Spiral the rope into the prepared pan, starting near the outside edge and working toward the centre. (The dough will not fill the entire pan.) The dough should be higher in the centre, so the finished bread looks like a crown. Cover the shaped dough with the damp towel. Then shape the other half of the dough. Let both breads rise until doubled, about 1 hour.

Heat oven to 400 degrees.

When the breads are ready to bake, beat the egg white with a little water. Brush this mixture onto the bread, taking care not to get it near the edge of the pan (or the bread will stick to the pan). Bake 30 minutes, until golden brown and the bread makes a hollow sound when you tap the bottom with your finger. Cool for 10 minutes. Then take the breads out of the pans and remove the waxed paper. Continue cooling on wire racks.

Makes 2 large loaves, 24 slices each.

THIN NOODLES IN BROTH

8 lbs. beef, chicken, and/or turkey bones
Salt, pepper, garlic powder, paprika
4 carrots, peeled and cut into chunks
2 large onions, peeled and quartered
Half of a celery, coarsely chopped
½ bell pepper, seeded, cored, and chopped
1 16-oz. can ripe tomatoes, including liquid
2 medium zucchini, cut into chunks
A generous handful of (Italian) parsley, washed
2 bay leaves
Salt
1 tbsp. whole white peppercorns
Water
10 oz. uncooked angel hair noodles

Heat your oven to 400 degrees.

Place the bones in a large roasting pan. Season with salt, pepper, garlic powder, and paprika. Roast, uncovered, until browned, about 1½ hours.

Remove bones from the roasting pan and place in a stock pot large enough to hold all the ingredients. If you don't have a pot that big, divide the bones into two pots. Add the remaining ingredients except the noodles. Cover with cold water and slowly bring to a boil. Lower the heat, skim off any foam that forms on the top, then simmer partially covered for 3 hours.

Strain the stock and refrigerate. Reserve some of the cooked vegetables for garnishing the soup.

About 30 minutes before serving, bring a large pot filled with salted water to the boil. Add the noodles, and cook briefly, according to package directions. Blanch with cold water to keep the noodles from continuing to cook.

While you are waiting for the water to boil, take the stock out of the refrigerator. Remove any fat that has hardened on the surface. Place the stock and reserved vegetables in a large pot and heat.

To serve, place some of the noodles in the bottom of each soup bowl. Ladle in some of the hot broth. Garnish with the vegetables.

Makes at least 4 quarts of stock.

TURKEY BREAST WITH PORCINI MUSHROOM STUFFING

1 turkey breast half, boned and obvious fat removed Salt, pepper, garlic powder, and paprika to taste
Porcini mushroom stuffing
Up to 4 cups non fat chicken stock
Up to 2 cups dry white wine

Heat oven to 400 degrees.

Prepare the turkey breast. Make a pocket in the meat. Then open it up and lay it flat, cut side up. Cover with waxed paper and pound to as even a thickness as possible. Season to taste with salt, pepper, and garlic powder. Cover and refrigerate until ready to

... is great for holidays

fill with the stuffing.

Prepare the stuffing.

Remove turkey from refrigerator. Place it on a new piece of waxed paper. Spread on the stuffing. (Refrigerate any extra and use to stuff cherry tomatoes on another occasion.) Roll the turkey, using the waxed paper to help you shape it. Season the outside with additional salt, pepper, and garlic powder. Sprinkle with paprika for color. Wrap the roast in cheesecloth. Secure the ends with a twist tie, leaving a handle at both ends.

Place in a small (7x11), shallow baking dish. Add chicken stock and white wine to a 1-inch depth. Place in the oven. Bake 20 minutes and turn, using the handles to help you. Repeat this process two more times, cooking 1½ hours total. Add more chicken stock and white wine as necessary. Remove from the oven. Let the cooked turkey rest at least ½ hour before slicing. May be refrigerated before slicing.

To serve, slice the roast into pieces ½-inch thick. Arrange on the green rice. Serve at once.

Makes 10 servings.

PORCINI MUSHROOM STUFFING

½ oz. dried porcini mushrooms
1 cup warm water
1 lb. fresh white mushrooms
2 tbsp. olive oil
½ cup no fat chicken stock
1 large garlic clove, finely chopped
1 tbsp. fresh (Italian) parsley, finely chopped
1 tsp. salt, or to taste
¼ tsp. ground white pepper
½ cup unseasoned bread crumbs or matzoh meal

Place dried porcini mushrooms in a medium bowl. Cover with warm water. Set aside for 10 minutes.

Place fresh mushrooms in a large colander and rinse by running water over them. Drain thoroughly. Place in food processor and chop. Set aside.

Heat the oil and chicken stock in a medium saucepan. Add the garlic and parsley. Cook briefly. Add the chopped fresh mushrooms.

Lift the porcini mushrooms out of the soaking water with a slotted spoon. Strain the liquid through cheesecloth or a coffee filter to remove the sand. Set aside. Chop the porcinis in the food processor and add to the rest of the ingredients in the pan. Raise the heat. Cook, uncovered, about 5 minutes.

Add ½ cup of the reserved soaking liquid, salt and pepper to the pan. Cook another 5 minutes. Add the bread crumbs and more liquid only if the stuffing seems too dry. Continue cooking only if the stuffing is too moist. When the stuffing is a good consistency for spreading on the turkey, remove from heat and use as directed.

Makes around 2½ cups. You need about 2 cups to stuff the turkey breast.

ITALIAN GREEN RICE

1 lb. fresh spinach
2 tbsp. olive oil
¼ cup no fat chicken stock
¼ cup onion, finely chopped
¼ cup celery, finely chopped
1 tsp. salt, or to taste
1/8 tsp. ground white pepper
2 cups non fat chicken stock or water
1½ cups rice

Wash the sand from the spinach by immersing in lukewarm water. Drain immediately, rinse the sand from the bottom of the bowl, and repeat the process. Then place the spinach in cold water to recrisp. Discard the stems and place leaves in food processor. Chop in batches and set aside. Save any liquid that forms.

Heat the oil and ¼ cup chicken stock in a medium saucepan. Add the onion, celery, salt, and pepper. Cook briefly, stirring. Raise the heat and add the spinach. Cook until the spinach begins to release its own liquid. Stir as necessary.

With the heat still on high, add the stock or water. When the ingredients in the pan come to a boil, add the rice. Reduce the heat and cover. Continue cooking 20 minutes. Check to see if the rice is done or if it needs a little more liquid. Cook 5 more minutes, if necessary.

To serve, place on an attractive serving platter. Arrange slices of turkey on top.

Makes 5 cups or 10 generous ½-cup servings.

ITALIAN CARROTS

2 bunches (about 20) small carrots, peeled
2 whole garlic cloves
Salt
1 tbsp. fresh parsley, chopped
Salt and pepper to taste

Place whole carrots, garlic, and 1 teaspoon salt in a medium saucepan. Cover with water. Bring to a boil, cover, and simmer until the carrots are crisp, yet tender, about 5 minutes, depending on how small the carrots are. Drain and discard the garlic.

Arrange on an attractive platter. Sprinkle with chopped parsley. Serve at once.

Serves 10.

RIPE PEACHES WITH HONEY RED WINE SAUCE

2 cups dry kosher red wine (Italian if possible)
⅔ cup honey
1 cinnamon stick
1 tsp. pure vanilla extract
5 large, firm peaches
Boiling water
Ice water
¼ cup sliced almonds, toasted, opt.

Place the wine, honey, and cinnamon stick in a small saucepan. Bring to a boil, lower the heat, and continue cooking until the liquid thickens. Remove from the heat. Take out the cinnamon stick and stir in the vanilla. Cool completely.

Place the peaches in a large bowl. Pour boiling water over them. After 3-5 minutes (less time if the peaches are very ripe), pour off the hot water. Plunge the peaches into ice water to stop them from cooking. Peel, pit, and halve. Place in a shallow glass dish. Pour the cooled sauce over the peaches. Cover with plastic wrap and refrigerate.

To serve, place peaches in glass bowls. Spoon some of the sauce over each one. Sprinkle with toasted almonds, if desired.

Serves 10.

Rosh Chodesh has special significance for women

By MAURICE LUCOW
CJN Western Correspondent

More and more Jewish women all over the world are observing Rosh Chodesh, "a women's festival," in a variety of innovative ways, according to Sue Berrin.

Berrin, the wife of Rabbi Victor Reinstein of Congregation Emanu-El, has been researching the subject for the past few years.

She has compiled and edited a source book comprising a number of essays, poems, songs, prayers and meditations on Rosh Chodesh and expects it will be published in 1995 by Jason Aranson of New York, whose company owns the Jewish Book of the Month Club.

While Rosh Chodesh is observed every month in the synagogue, with special prayers to welcome the new moon, it is regarded as a festival of special significance to women.

Berrin states in the foreword of her book that she hopes the material, contributed by a number of women (with one essay by her husband), is "educational, inspirational, scholarly, pragmatic, entertaining, insightful, and teaches and inspires many types of observances and relationships to Judaism."

One of the essays is by Norma Joseph, of Montreal; another is by Charlotte Atlung Sutker, of Victoria.

The first contemporary article about Rosh Chodesh observance as it relates to women, This Month Is For You, written 20 years ago by Arlene Agus and included in the book The Jewish Woman, is reprinted in Berrin's book.

Berrin told The CJN this article sparked a renaissance "which brought to light the Rosh Chodesh holiday which had faded from people's memories."

Another essay relates the experience of Nashot Hakotel — Women of the Wall in Jerusalem, who since 1988 have been fighting for the right to daven at the Western Wall.

The Israeli Supreme Court is deadlocked on the matter and Berrin says a committee of Kotel authorities is trying to solve the problem.

Berrin says the observance of Rosh Chodesh is especially important because it is one way to bring unaffiliated women back to some kind of Jewish observance — especially young women and those without much Hebrew school training who have strayed far from their Jewish roots.

The groups that observe the holiday usually hold informal gatherings that speak to the spiritual needs of women, who don't always find fulfilment in traditional institutions.

In Victoria, for example, Berrin says participants can learn davening skills and try them out in "a small, safe way" with some 20 women, rather than in the formal setting of the shul.

Sue Berrin

"Nobody will disapprove if they make mistakes," she points out.

Rosh Chodesh marks the beginning of the monthly lunar cycle which governs the Hebrew calendar. The first commandment after the Exodus from Egypt was to observe it as a festival day and there is a special Rosh Chodesh Musaf, which in the synagogue is recited after the Torah reading and Haftorah.

Berrin says the Talmud rules that work is permitted on Rosh Chodesh but some women abstain on that day anyway. Later sources say the exemption was a reward to the righteous women who refused to surrender their jewels for the creation of the Golden Calf when asked to do so by Aaron.

Berrin notes the close relationship between the new moon and the woman's monthly cycle, both of which change at regular intervals, like a woman's body.

She quotes sources as saying that Rosh Chodesh is a time to mark change, transitions, special moments in our lives — for example the brit milah, menopause or aging. One ritual for menopause uses a red ribbon, placing it in a circle on the floor, cutting it and giving a piece to each woman present.

Women bring babies for naming to their Rosh Chodesh groups. They may mark the weaning of a baby, for which there is no traditional ceremony or prayer.

Generally, Berrin says, the Rosh Chodesh groups have developed their own rituals relating to women's experiences that are not marked in traditional liturgy. In a group of women it is easier to have a celebration of such special occasions, she says.

Since this is a women's holiday with no strictures for observance, the groups can be as experimental and as creative as they wish in the ceremonies they choose.

In one group in New York, the women make and wear masks and talk about something hidden in their lives. One group holds meetings in the shvitz.

The Victoria group meets in private homes on the Sunday closest to Rosh Chodesh, where they daven mainly traditional prayers, including Shacharit. Then there are songs and socializing and refreshments.

Berrin, a native of Los Angeles, was first attracted to Rosh Chodesh groups in Jerusalem, where she worked as a journalist for the Jewish Student Press.

She learned that there were active groups not only in Israel, but in Holland and England, and that the movement was spreading rapidly. She has been in contact with many different groups for her book. She says that as far back as the 17th century, special prayers for women, specifically for Rosh Chodesh, were written in Yiddish by European Ashkenazi women.

The essays in her book indicate that prayers used by the groups are frequently gender neutral; for example, G-d doesn't appear as a male, but is referred to as the Creator.

Berrin met her husband in Israel. They married in Los Angeles and have been in Victoria for over 10 years. They have three children. Her parents are former Torontonians who moved to Los Angeles a number of years ago.

Israeli businessman 'refreshes mind' as JNF emissary

By MAURICE LUCOW
CJN Western Correspondent

When you approach the age of 50 and you've been working hard all your life — including 12-hour days at business, and a three-year stretch in the Israeli army — it may be time for a change.

That's the decision Gideon Shavit and his wife Edna made about two years ago when he accepted the post as Jerusalem emissary to the Jewish National Fund (JNF), Pacific region, in Canada.

Edna Shavit also looked forward to the change, after working for years as assistant to the president of Ben-Gurion University of the Negev (BGU).

Gideon therefore took a leave of absence from his job as president of Rotem Industries Ltd. in Beersheva and the family moved to Vancouver with two of their children. One son stayed to attend BGU.

It is a change of locale for the Shavits, but life is busier than ever. Shavit now often works longer hours than he did in Israel, as he meets and consults with committees, organizing Negev Dinners, advising business people from Israel who come to the West Coast, giving talks at Jewish schools and university groups, responding to mail and phone queries about Israel, writing an Israeli business column for the local weekly newspaper and generally being involved in hasbarah for Israel.

But Shavit is not complaining. He told The CJN he loves the JNF job and the challenge of fundraising. He organized two Negev Dinners this year, in Vancouver and in Kelowna, B.C., and is already planning next year's in Vancouver and Victoria.

And he has just completed plans for the annual Yom Kippur campaign in the shuls.

Actually, the JNF job is not very different from what he's been doing at Rotem. He sees serving as shaliach as a marketing and promotion task — you develop a concept that the market (the Jewish community) finds acceptable and you proceed to sell it.

Shavit trained for his work in business management, marketing and promotion at the Hebrew University where he got his BA in economics and an MA in business administration. He honed his skills further by working at BGU as chief accountant and guest lecturer, speaking to graduate and undergraduate business administration students on entrepreneurship.

He was one of the forces in establishing Rotem, a government-sponsored high-tech corporation with 400 employees, and he was the company's first president.

Rotem works with research institutes to identify and develop creative scientific products with high marketing potential, helps establish industries to make the products, and follows up with promotion to market them. Rotem developed the Negev's first viable high-tech industrial park.

Basically, Rotem covers four major areas: optronics, detection and identification, materials and processes, ecology and equipment for controlled environment. The primary aim is to provide training for students of the region to encourage them to stay, rather than leave for high-tech facilities in Tel Aviv or Haifa.

Gideon Shavit

Rotem has assisted Russian scientists who are well trained in scientific research and math but lack the know-how to transform ideas for practical use, because they have always worked under a government umbrella. With no experience in the market place, they are not prepared for the free enterprise system.

According to Shavit, what the Russians need is the experience to adjust to the techniques of the Western world.

"It's an exciting place to work," said Shavit of Rotem. But, he added, it's important to make a change every once in a while "to refresh your mind."

Fundraising in the Pacific region is bringing in more dollars every year, Shavit said, but many Israel-based organizations are now in British Columbia and he conceded that campaigning has become more competitive.

Nevertheless, JNF is well established "and we're doing the best possible to carry on our work."

Shavit said JNF has sent tutors from Israel to Canada to teach kids what the organization has accomplished and still plans to do. The tutors are used extensively in B.C.

"We have a big education budget," he said, "because we believe in its importance. Of the total $250 million JNF budget, the organization devotes 5.2 per cent to education and information, as stipulated in its 1961 covenant with the Israeli government."

Summer camps, audio-visual aids, posters, pamphlets and books, and lectures are some of the tools used to strengthen the bond between the Jewish people and Israel.

A recent video seen by The CJN shows Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin speaking at a world conference of JNF leaders, asking them to create conditions to provide the facilities for at least five million people in the Jewish state. After the speech he is shown dropping a coin into the familiar JNF blue box.

Shavit gets a daily summary of Israeli news by fax to keep up to date on what's going on in Israel. "People are always calling for the latest news and we can give it to them," he noted.

JNF, said Shavit, employs about 6,000 people, working on projects from Eilat in the south to Metulla in the north.

"We emphasize the vast scope of our activities, stressing that 71 per cent of our budget is invested directly in the land. Through our programs we have alleviated unemployment, providing more than 1,000 temporary jobs for new immigrants from Russia and Ethiopia, and for demobilized soldiers."

The B.C. Forest in the Galilee has been a popular project in the Pacific region and there are groves sponsored by Vancouver, Victoria and Kelowna.

Currently JNF is helping cope with the water situation in Israel, which is a crucial factor in the peace process and in the day-to-day life of the country.

As there are only about 50 days of rain a year, it is necessary to trap as much water as possible when it rains and a network of reservoirs is being established all over the country. This is a very expensive undertaking for the JNF, and Shavit said the Pacific region is considering sponsoring a "B.C. reservoir" as a new campaign project, slated to start next year.

In planning for peace, further development of the Jerusalem Peace Forest and other projects are underway. These will be carried out under the Jerusalem 3000 program to mark the 3000th anniversary of Jerusalem in 1996.

Marble marvels

Jerusalem Dateline

The rotary saw whined and sputtered as Italian sculptress Maria Assunta Carini goaded it into a towering marbel sculpture, creating a halo of dust around her. The sculpture, The Light of Air, won third prize in this year's third Annual Stone Sculpture Symposium, held in Israel's Galilee town of Ma'alot-Tarshiha.

Noam Rabinovich won this year's competition for his massive work entitled A Society of Plants, while Kim Moon Kyu of Korea won second prize for his work entitled A Desire for Active Life.

A total of 80 tons of Galilean marble from a nearby quarry were commissioned for the event. Of the 15 sculptors, seven were Israelis and the others were from Turkey, France, Mexico, South Korea, Uzbekistan, Italy, Romania, and the United States. They sawed, chiselled, chipped and sanded, some finishing their sculptures quickly and others working frantically in order to finish within the allotted 10 days.

Ma'alot is located high in the Galilean hills, two kilometres from the border. Established in 1957, it is home to immigrants from 30 countries living together with native Israelis.

In 1963, Ma'alot and the Arab village of Tashiha, a kilometre to the west, joined to form one municipality. The arrangement, with a joint local council, has proven to be a successful example of Jewish-Arab coexistence.

No more macho men — Israelis shed excess hair

By AVI SHAMIR

Israeli men have long had a reputation for being macho. But nowadays a new machismo is emerging on the fashion scene as men of different ages and social backgrounds visit beauty salons to remove unwanted hair from their chests.

They walk in, furtively at times, with excess body hair. They emerge as silken as Greek gods.

The phenomenon is not altogether new. One leading Tel Aviv cosmetician says her establishment has been frequented by men for more than 20 years. But now men in increasing numbers are stepping out of the closet and into the salon. The trend has received wide press coverage from the leading Hebrew daily Yediot Aharonot to the ultra-Orthodox publication Diglenu.

Not that men who undergo hair removal — epilation — are always forthcoming to the press. Most of the men I encountered at Tel Aviv beauty salons refused to grant interviews. One young Yemenite agreed to make an "anonymous contribution" using an assumed name. "I'm doing this for aesthetic reasons," said Tal.

"I started getting hair on my chest at age 18, and it never really grew in. At first I considered it a minor annoyance. I felt that it didn't add to my appearance or self-image, but I tried to disregard it," said the 24-year-old.

The Tel Aviv-based youth director says a newspaper article on epilation persuaded him to find a way out of his hairy situation. After more than a year of costly and at times painful treatment, Tal is delighted with the results. "The pain is not unbearable. If it was I wouldn't do it. The main thing is, now I can take my shirt off and walk out in the sun without feeling inhibited."

And how does his new look grab the ladies? "Look, if I want to win over a lady, I don't have to change my appearance. Girls I went out with never made an issue of my chest hair."

He concedes, however, that the romance factor did play a role in his decision to undergo treatment. "Young Israeli girls, especially of high school age, can make very damaging remarks about your appearance, like 'this one's too skinny,' 'this one's too fat,' or 'that one has all that disgusting hair on his chest.' "

Still, Tal would not have gone through epilation were it not for what he terms a "personal rapport" with cosmetician Hanna Ohayon, whose establishment, she claims, is the only one of its kind to cater exclusively to men. Moroccan-born Ohayon offers practical advice, and in some cases, emotional encouragement and support.

"Not all men are suited to this kind of treatment," she cautions. "Those with psoriasis and other skin conditions are advised against it, and those with taut skin and strong hair need more sessions than those with thin hair."

Epilation is done with a sophisticated, computerized instrument that produces radio waves at a frequency of up to 27 megahertz. A thin needle is injected under the skin to "root out" unwanted hair and the process is repeated up to 20 times to thin out the hair and ultimately stop growth.

In addition to the chest, epilation is commonly applied on the upper back, ears and between the eyebrows. Some ultra-Orthodox Jews, especially Sephardis permitted to trim their beards, undergo epilation to remove excess growth on their upper jaws.

Ohayon believes that the smooth chest image, as projected by such celebrities as Sylvester Stallone and Richard Gere, has influenced many Israeli men. "Many women find a smooth, shiny chest with bulging muscles aesthetically clean, fashionable and sexy," she says.

Drorit and Haim Ron, who run a multifaceted cosmetic centre in central Tel Aviv, say other factors contribute to the situation. "You have to understand that men come here because they have a personal problem or need," says Haim. "In many cases it's one they keep to themselves for years until they can afford to do something about it.

"Even then, they might come in with a hat or motorcycle helmet on, so that no one will recognize them."

Drorit says there is a stigma attached to epilation. "It's assumed that all men who undergo it are either gay or crazy. Actually, we have a very varied clientele. Some are teenagers, and others are married men. We even have pensioners."

Be that as it may, not all cosmeticians are standing in line to help men with their hairy problems. Bracha Ordentlicht, whose Or Adin (Gentle Skin) salon has been in business for 43 years, insists that "smooth skin is a womanly asset, not a man's. There's nothing wrong with a man who has hair on his chest."

Israeli, Diaspora leaders meet in Jerusalem

World Zionist Press Service

The year 5754 may well be remembered as the year when Israeli and Diaspora Jews finally acknowledged that a deepening gap exists between them.

To tackle the issues confronting world Jewry, President Ezer Weizman convened a two-day meeting in late June at his residence in Jerusalem. Entitled Dialogue with the President, the conference was attended by some 140 Diaspora Jewish leaders, intellectuals and students from the United States, France, Britain, Canada, Russia, Europe, Latin America, South Africa and Australia, and by a similar number of their Israeli counterparts. American Diaspora-Israel relations tended to dominate the proceedings.

The meeting was held under a huge, blue and white striped marquee on the lawn of the President's residence; an informal atmosphere was created by seating the panelists on sofas. President Weizman, who also lounged in a sofa, often interrupted the proceedings with an anecdote or point of his own, projecting the image of a TV talk show host rather than a head of state.

The relaxed atmosphere engendered frank discussion and the dialogue was marked by a succession of outspoken and provocative speakers. Some Israelis, in particular President Weizman, time and again refused to recognize the legitimacy of the Diaspora and called for increased aliyah.

Israel's UN Ambassador Gad Ya'acobi took a more conciliatory stance. "We must see a shift in the emphasis of Israel-Diaspora relations," he said, "away from charity and towards investment and joint ventures and, yes, aliyah too."

American Jewish leaders, like Alfred Moses, chair of the American Jewish Committee, insisted that Israel could not be strong without their lobbying in Washington. Maynard Wishner, chair of the Council of Jewish Federations, spoke of two Jewish centres, one in America and one in Israel, comparing them to the historical centres of Jerusalem and Babylon.

Yiddish phrases used

Yiddish phrases were bandied about by the older speakers, with President Weizman nodding his head and smiling in comprehension. This seemed to highlight the fact that, while some members of the older generation can communicate through Yiddish and a shared cultural heritage, younger Diaspora and Israeli Jews have no common language.

Rabbi Arthur Hertzberg, Professor of Religion at Dartmouth University in the United States, in an eloquent critique of the Diaspora's indifference to Jewish culture, placed the blame on its lack of Jewish literacy.

"To be the leader of a major American Jewish organization," he observed, "you don't have to speak Hebrew; rather you must have time, energy and money. American Jewish leaders are embarrassed by Jewish literacy."

Moses dismissed this characterization. "American Jewry and Israel need leaders that can lobby effectively for them on Capitol Hill," he said.

But President Weizman insisted that Israel is able to effectively lobby on its own behalf. "We've grown up now," he observed impatiently. "We've had our bar mitzvah. Give us the credit for having earned the respect and support of the U.S. administration for what we've achieved."

Rabbi David Hartman, Professor of Jewish Thought at the Hebrew University, injected more than a modicum of Judaism into what was essentially Zionist talk.

"The issue is not whether Israel is more or less central to Jewish life," he said, "but the future and survival of the Jewish people. The difference between the Diaspora and Israel is that if a Jew wants to move outside the Jewish community in America he can do so. If an Israeli wants to move outside the Jewish community he must move to Los Angeles.

"But aliyah does not entirely solve the problem," he added. "For if a Jew in Petah Tikvah moves to Dallas, he is an Israeli but not necessarily a Jew. I as a Jew cannot imagine Judaism without Torah."

Unfortunately, the deeper issues dividing Israel and the Diaspora were overshadowed by Deputy Foreign Minister Yossi Beilin's surprise call for the dissolution of the Jewish Agency WZO, which evoked the animosity of virtually every participant.

Beilin, who earlier in the year had shocked a WIZO gathering by insisting that Israel no longer needed Diaspora Jewish funds, proposed to replace the Jewish Agency/WZO with Beit Yisrael — a mass democratic movement of world Jewry that would offer every 17-year-old Diaspora Jew the opportunity to participate in an Israel Experience program free of charge, as well as funding aliyah, Jewish and Zionist programs in the Diaspora, and an ongoing dialogue between Israel and the Diaspora.

"We are using yesterday's tools to deal with tomorrow," he stressed.

Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin responded with dissatisfaction. "With deep sorrow, I have to say . . . that a deputy minister has made remarks that are not keeping with government policy," he said. "The plan is nonsensical and my government has no intention of implementing such craziness."

Acting Jewish Agency and WZO chair Yehiel Leket was equally scathing in his condemnation of Beilin. "The plan has created confusion and embarrassment," he said. "It has done untold damage to Israel-Diaspora ties when we should be closing ranks in pursuit of peace."

Leket also pointed out that it was unthinkable to fund free trips to Israel for wealthy Diaspora Jewish teenagers when 600,000 Israelis were living below the poverty line.

Nevertheless, Beilin's call for escalating Israel Experience programs for Diaspora youth did touch a responsive chord. British student leader Ronnie Preston said, "This would be a step in the right direction," and British and Commonwealth Chief Rabbi Jonathan Sacks said that Israel Experience programs for Jewish youth should be at the core of a new Israel-Diaspora relationship.

"Young Diaspora Jews who spend significant time living in Israel are more likely to become active leaders in their own communities," he said. "Diaspora Jews whose identity is weak are less likely to support Israel and more likely to marry out."

Predictably, many issues were raised but few concrete conclusions were reached. President Weizman, however, who doesn't care for idle talk, concluded the conference by resolving to set up a committee of experts to examine ways to improve Israel-Diaspora relations. He will also request that the Ministry of Education explore ways to teach Israeli school children more about Judaism and Diaspora Jewry.

Thanks to President Weizman's initiative, Israelis and Diaspora Jews are moving into the new year with a feeling that their increasingly distant relationship is finally being redefined. There is hope that new channels of communication will open up in the coming year, channels that can only enrich and deepen this vital relationship.

Israeli designer clothed country's top women

World Zionist Press Service

It seems an incongruous match: Israel and the exclusive world of haute couture. Yet, at the Israel Museum's recently opened exhibit, Lola Beer: 50 years of Fashion in Israel, this rather inconsonant association makes perfect sense.

A black and white photo of Israel's first prime minister, David Ben-Gurion, departing for an official visit to the United States in 1951 is on display. By his side, his wife Paula is wearing a dress designed by Lola Beer.

Another shot, taken in 1968, shows U.S. president Lyndon B. Johnson shaking hands with Leah Rabin, wife of Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin (then Israel's ambassador to the United States), wearing a Jacqueline Kennedy-style gown, another Beer creation.

More than 25 years later, Leah Rabin appeared in another Beer garment at the signing of the Gaza/Jericho agreement in Cairo.

Lola Beer dressed them all: Vera Weizmann, Miriam Eshkol, Golda Meir, Zipporah Sharret, Aura Herzog and Shulamit Shamir. Wives of ministers, ambassadors, mayors and artists, Beer's client list is a veritable who's who among the country's social and political elite.

Since the establishment of the State of Israel in 1948, Lola Beer has played a prominent role in designing — quite literally — the nation's public image.

"She made us repectable and esthetically beautiful," said former first lady Aura Herzog, who in 1992 awarded Beer the Golden Needle award, an honor shared with Gottex founder Leah Gottlieb.

An elegantly-dressed, slender woman (she only wears her own designs) with aristocratic features, Lola Beer, who must be approaching 80 — she refuses to divulge her age — has not missed a day of work since she opened her fashion atelier in 1940.

Despite her long tenure in the country, Beer speaks only a smattering of Hebrew and claims she was the only person Ben-Gurion would speak to in English.

Some of Beer's staff have been with her for 45 years and her most recently hired employee joined the firm 28 years ago. She herself arrives punctually at her studio in Tel Aviv at 7 a.m. and works straight through until early evening.

"If you enjoy your work, you don't think about minor discomforts and exhaustion," she says.

Born in Moravia, Beer graduated from Prague's College of Fashion Design in 1939 and emigrated the following year to what was then British-governed Palestine; she was among the last Jews to leave Czechoslovakia.

Aside from an older brother, who was already living in Eretz Yisrael, the rest of her family stayed behind and Beer never saw them again.

When Beer informed her brother of her plans to open a fashion studio, her sister-in-law commented: "No one dresses up here. Seamstresses are starving."

But when a milliner borrowed some of Beer's dresses for a hat show, it was her garments that made a hit. Since then orders have not stopped coming in.

Many of Beer's earliest clients were wealthy ladies from Beirut, Cairo and Alexandria. It was, however, Vera Weizmann (the wife of Israel's first President and "the most elegant woman in Israel at the time," according to Beer) who introduced the designer to the upper crust of political and social milieu.

Beer recalls that when the state was established, female freedom fighters, many from kibbutzim, were forced, literally overnight, to become the fledgling state's emissaries. The transformation wasn't easy.

"Women here didn't understand fashion: they thought themselves above clothes," says Beer. "But they were wrong. First impressions are very important."

Beer single-handedly introduced Israel to the world of haute couture. She designed clothes to fit the figure and personality of her clients, the result being many long-lasting personal and professional relationships.

There were exceptions. Beer's relationship with Golda Meir lasted only a few dresses. "She didn't want to come for fittings, and sent her secretary instead," recalls Beer.

The Lola Beer exhibit at the Israel Museum is — appropriately — a fashion show. There's only one not-so-minor variation. It is the visitors who stroll along the catwalk, while the mannequins modeling the outfits are posed on either side of the aisle.

Interspersed are photographs recapturing both the history of Beer's career and that of the state. Behind many of the dummies are narrow mirrors so that viewers catch a partial glimpse of themselves alongside Beer's designs. Curator of the museum's design department, Izzaka Gaon, intended to created a total experience, "to evoke an awareness of our own physical appearance."

Walking through the exhibit visitors are struck by the fact that most of the dresses are quite unremarkable. There is nothing original or indigenously Israeli about them. Clearly always in sync with the fashions of the times, Beer took her cues from French designers (Yves St. Laurent, Christian Dior and Chanel, in particular) on her twice yearly trips to Paris, where she acquired reproduction rights.

Why then the exhibit? It is a tribute, says Gaon, to the industriousness of a woman whose business survived for so long, maintaining the same quality and reputation.

The show is also a cultural history tour, adding another dimension to the perennial and often vexing question of how Israelis are perceived by the world and how they see themselves.

Few can afford a Beer creation — price tags run in the thousands of dollars. However, it was not tongue-in-cheek when Israel Museum director Martin Weyl remarked at the exhibit's opening that "most women in Israel have worn an outfit designed by Beer."

Indeed most have. In 1966 Beer designed the winter and summer uniforms for the women serving in the Israel Defense Forces. With only slight modifications, her summer uniform is what women soldiers wear to this day. Beer also designed the outfits worn by El Al stewardesses from 1957 to 1972 (winning an award in Switzerland for the design), as well as the uniforms for the Israel Postal Authority.

• American rabbi C. Ariel Stone becomes the first Reform rabbi to head a congregation in the former Soviet Union. Rabbi Stone, 31, will minister to some of Ukraine's 8,000 Reform Jews as spiritual leader of Kiev's Congregation HaTikvah.

• Ethopian-born athlete Joseph Kibur wins gold in the men's 5,000-metre race and silver in the 10,000-metre event during the Canada Games in Kamloops, B.C. The 20-year-old Simon Fraser University student won three gold medals at last year's Maccabiah Games. He is later named the university's Athlete of the Year.

October (Tishrei/Cheshvan)

• Israel releases 750 Palestinian prisoners from its jails in the first stage of a five-year schedule under the Declaration of Principles. Those freed include the sick, those under 18 and over 50, but no convicted murderers.

• The ruling Progressive Conservative party goes down to election defeat, losing all of its seats but two. The winning Liberals form a majority government, with the Quebec-based Bloc Quebecois becoming the Official Opposition with 54 seats. The Reform Party wins 53 seats.

The Liberal government includes four Jewish MPs: David Berger of St. Henri-Westmount; Barry Campbell of St. Paul's riding in Toronto; Secretary of State for Multiculturalism and the Status of Women Sheila Finestone, who handily won her Mount Royal riding with 83 per cent of the vote; and Windsor West veteran Herb Gray, who accepted his cabinet posts of solicitor general and House leader wearing a bright blue kippah and clutching a silver-embossed Hebrew Bible.

Jewish MPs exiting the political scene include former Conservative cabinet minister Gerry Weiner, who finished third behind the Liberals and the BQ in his Montreal riding of Pierrefronds-Dollard; and Skeena, B.C. New Democratic Party representative Dave Barrett.

• In another election defeat, six-time Jerusalem mayor Teddy Kollek loses his re-election bid to Likud candidate Ehud Olmert. Olmert wins 59 per cent of the vote, Kollek 35 per cent. Kollek, 82, retires from politics.

• The University of Toronto launches an investigation into English professor Robert O'Driscoll, author of two books riddled with Jewish conspiracy theories. The university will look at O'Driscoll's competence and ability to teach in a discrimination-free environment. O'Driscoll has been a tenured professor for 27 years.

• A French electrician is jailed for one year for hurling anti-Semitic slurs at his neighbors over several years. Georges Anne, 47, must also pay his neighbors $20,000 (Cdn) in damages and $2,000 to a French anti-racism organization. It is the stiffest sentence ever handed down for such an offence.

• Seven survivors of the Sobibor extermination camp mark the 50th anniversary of a revolt that let 300 of 600 working Jews escape. Many of the escapees were killed by land mines surrounding the camp, and those remaining behind were executed in retaliation for the German SS officers and Ukrainian guards killed in the revolt. Only 36 escapees survived the war.

• Entertainer Victor Borge helps mark another 50th anniversary commemoration, this one the rescue of Danish Jews by their countrymen. Thanks to a warning passed on by a high-ranking German official, 7,200 Danish Jews, 700 non-Jewish spouses and children and 11,000 Danish resistance fighters were ferried to safety in Sweden by an improvised flotilla of fishing boats. Borge was one of those rescued.

November (Chesvan/Kislev)

• Lebanese immigrant Michael Safadi, 29, is sentenced to four years and three months in a Nova Scotia jail for promoting hatred against Jews and for shooting a Prince Edward Island man he thought was Jewish. In presenting his own defence, Safadi claimed he was framed by the Israeli secret service.

• Israeli Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin arrives in Canada to meet with newly-elected Canadian Prime Minister Jean Chretien and address the Council of Jewish Federations' General Assembly in Montreal. In his 30-minute Montreal speech, Rabin urges the 3,000 North American GA delegates to support the peace process.

• A Jewish Agency airlift brings all but 50 members of Armenia's Jewish community to Israel. The 2,000-year-old community, which numbered 1,040 in 1970, shrank to 300 through intermarriage and mass aliyah during the 1989 war with neighboring Georgia.

• The historic Newtown Synagogue in Sydney, Australia, is almost gutted by an arson attack. The ark and six Torah scrolls inside are undamaged, although a nearby lamp is melted by the heat of the fire.

• A buckskin-clad former prime minister proves hard to resist as Canadians flock to buy Pierre Trudeau's Memoirs. Among the tidbits included in the 380-page tome is the fact that Trudeau, 74, was once arrested as a Jewish spy while travelling throught the Mideast in 1948: Arab soldiers in Jerusalem thought the bearded student was working for the Haganah.

• Spanish King Juan Carlos and Queen Sophia travel to Israel for a three-day visit, the first ever by a reigning European monarch. The king signs a joint Israeli-Spanish economic agreement to ease trade between the two countries, now valued at $500 million (US) a year.

• Workmen unearth a 1937 time capsule from beneath the gate of Montreal's Baron de Hirsch cemetery. Newspaper headlines from that long-ago July show how little things have changed. "Deliberate Plot Revealed in Belfast Bomb Explosion" reads the Gazette, while the Canadian Jewish Review trumpets "Present Regime Cannot Continue in Palestine." The capsule contained no letter to finders.

• Three terrorists confess to murdering former Montrealer Jason Friedberg and three other Israelis, causing pandemonium in the Jerusalem courtroom. The three, members of the PLO's Fatah faction, say they were paid 3,500 dinars and $1,000 (US) for every Israeli Jew they killed. Jawad, Mohammed and Ibraham Shamansa are later sentenced to four consecutive life terms.

• The head of the Canadian branch of the Simon Wiesenthal Centre reveals further proof that British officials knew in 1942 about massive Jewish executions in Europe. Searching through British archives, Sol Littman found a summary of a speech given by Nazi propaganda minister Joseph Goebbels on Sept. 23, 1942, in which he told 60 German journalists that European Jews were already feeling "the inevitable harshness of physical extermination." British Foreign Office officials at the time were more interested in Goebbel's comments on German morale.

• A Georgian-born Israeli armwrestler wins hands-down at the World Armwrestling Championships in Edmonton. Eli Sapiashvili, 25, beats all comers in the right-handed division of the 110 kg category. The 14-strong Israeli contingent is one of 20 countries competing in the event.

• Montreal-born academic Bernard Shapiro is named the first Jewish principal of McGill University. Shapiro previously served as Ontario's deputy minister of education and as head of the Ontario Institute for Studies in Education (OISE). His identical twin brother Harold Shapiro is president of Princeton University in New Jersey.

December (Kislev/Tevet)

• Canada extends an invitation to PLO Chairman Yasser Arafat to come for a visit in the new year. The Ministry of External Affairs says Arafat is welcome, but there is no word on his response.

• American astronaut Jeffrey Hoffman plays the first game of dreidl in space while aboard the space shuttle Endeavor. Hoffman, who took a mezuzah with him on his first space trip in 1985, brings along a menorah as well but cannot light Chanukah candles for safety reasons.

• The Dec. 13 deadline for Israeli troop withdrawals from the West Bank and Gaza comes and goes amidst fears the peace process will collapse. Israeli Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin explains the delay by saying the two sides need "time to rethink." Growing violence kills five Israeli Jews and five Arabs in the first week of the month, bringing to 23 the number of people killed since the Declaration of Principles was signed Sept. 13.

• The Vatican establishes diplomatic ties with Israel, ending 2,000 years of troubled relations between the Catholic Church and world Jewry. The agreement to exchange ambassadors is signed by Israeli Deputy Foreign Minister Yossi Beilin and Vatican undersecretary Msgr. Claudio Maria Delli in Jerusalem. In March Andrea Di Montezemolo and Shmuel Hadas take up their posts.

In another diplomatic first, South Korea announces it will open an embassy in Israel. Up to now, the South Korean ambassador to Italy was responsible for his country's interests in Israel.

January (Tevet/Shevat)

• A 26-year-old Jerusalem yeshivah student wins the $3-million (US) jackpot in Israel's Lotto. The soon-to-be-married man tells reporters he wants "to maintain my normal routine, to help my family and to thank G-d deeply for answering my prayers."

• Seven Canadian Jews are among the 87 named to the Order of Canada. They include Canadian Jewish Congress president and historian Irving Abella, Vancouver Jewish Federation founder Arthur Fouks, Vancouver philanthropist Joe Segal, Haligonian psychiatrist Dr. Judith Hamerling Gold, Winnipeg NDP politician Saul Cherniak, McGill University Opera Studio co-founder Edith Della Pergola and Montreal volunteer Arnold Steinberg.

• The Israel Defence Force reveals that the number of soldiers killed in action jumped to 45 in 1993, up from 24 in 1992. Accidental deaths, traffic fatalities and training deaths among soldiers dropped, according to the IDF manpower branch.

• Suspected Hezbollah terrorist Mohamed Hussein Al Husseini is ordered deported from Canada. A Lebanese native, Al Husseini entered Canada with false documents in 1991 and was granted refugee status within two months.

February (Shevat/Adar)

• Israel's sole representative at the Lillehammer Olympics, Russian-born skater Mikhail Shmerkin, finishes 16th in his event. Shmerkin, 24, is the first Israeli to compete in the Winter Games. He was hoping to finish 10th.

• Six buses transport 300 residents of Sarajevo from their beseiged city to the Croatian coast. The 12-hour overnight convoy, organized by the American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee and Sarajevo's La Benevolencija Jewish agency, includes 176 Jews in addition to Croats, Serbs and Muslims. Approximately 50 Jewish evacuees go on to Israel. Three hundred Jews remain in Sarajevo.

• Jews across Canada hold vigils in support of agunot, women whose husbands will not grant them a Jewish divorce. Two hundred people turn out in Vancouver, Edmonton, Winnipeg, Toronto, Ottawa, Montreal and Halifax. There are an estimated 10,000 agunot in Israel.

• Parliament unanimously abandons its 117-year-old opening prayer, with its three references to Jesus Christ, in favor of an interdenominational invocation for peace and wisdom.

• The University of Western Ontario apologizes to four Arab students who complained of anti-Arab discrimination in 1987. The complainants receive $2,000 each from the London, Ont., university and a published letter of apology in the local and campus newspapers after they charged the school with banning a controversial pro-Palestinian poster and failing to address repeated disruptions of Arab student events.

• Kiryat Arba settler Dr. Baruch Goldstein opens fire in a Hebron mosque on Purim, killing 29 Palestinians at prayer before being killed himself. The massacre, widely condemned in Israel and abroad, leads Syria, Jordan and Lebanon to break off bilateral talks with Israel. Compensation for the victims is later set at $6.7 million.

In retaliation, a Lebanese man shoots at a van carrying 15 Lubavitch yeshivah students on the Brooklyn Bridge, wounding four. One, 16-year-old Aaron Halberstam, dies later in hospital.

• B'nai Brith Canada's League for Human Rights reveals that reported incidents of anti-Semitic harassment and vandalism are at their highest levels in 12 years. Numbers for 1993 show a 31 per cent increase in reported incidents, with 105 cases of anti-Semitic vandalism and 151 of harassment across the country. Vandalism grew faster than harassment.

• Italians get their daily dose of Yiddishkeit after Milanese Jewish actor Moni Ovadia begins hosting a weeday program on Italian state radio. The show explores different facets of Yiddish culture. About 40,000 Jews live in Italy.

MARCH (Adar/INissan)

• Israeli outlaws the Kach and Kahane Chai political parties, which follow the anti-Arab teachings of the late Rabbi Meir Kahane, as terrorist organizations. It is now illegal in Israel to donate money to the two Jewish groups, display their symbols or show support in any way. Kahane Chai leader Binyamin Kahane, earlier convicted of a 1991 attack on Israeli police, and Kach leader Baruch Marzel are jailed.

• Canada steps in to prevent a pogrom against Syria's 1,050 Jews, formally requesting their protection through Ambassador John McNee. The pogrom was threatened by the Syrian Muslim Party of Justice in retaliation for the Hebron mosque massacre.

• The Supreme Court of Canada rules 4 to 3 to uphold the acquittal of accused war criminal Imre Finta. In a controversial written decision, the court finds that Finta, the former Hungarian gendarmes captain alleged to have sent 8,600 Jews to Nazi death camps in 1944, was not at fault for following orders he believed were legal, given the climate of anti-Semitism in Hungary at the time.

• The neo-fascist National Alliance party wins 13 per cent of the vote in Italy's parliamentary elections, becoming the third most popular party in the country. The party, heir to wartime dictator Benito Mussolini, joins the right-wing alliance led by billionaire media tycoon Sylvio Berlusconi.

APRIL (Nissan/Iyar)

• A French court sentences Paul Touvier to life imprisonment for crimes against humanity, almost 50 years to the month after he selected seven Jews for execution during the Vichy regime. Touvier, 79, had been condemned to death in 1946 and 1947 for war crimes committed as a militia intelligence chief. He went into hiding and was later pardoned in 1972 by then French president Georges Pompidou. The crimes against humanity charges were laid in 1989, and Touvier became the first Frenchman to be convicted under them at his March trial in Versailles.

• Russian ultranationalist Vladimir Zhirinovsky throws shrubbery at 100 Jewish student protestors in Strasbourg, France, after addressing the Council of Europe. Zhirinovsky denies reports that his mother married a Jew, Volf Eidelshtein, and that Zhirinovsky used that surname until age 18.

• A Hamas suicide bomber kills eight Israelis and wounds 50 more in Afula. The dead include Ahuva Cohen Onalla, a recently converted Muslim woman whose Arab husband declined to attend her funeral. "I am afraid that because of what my people did to my wife, some of her people will not tolerate my presence at the [Jewish] graveside," he says. One week after the Afula bombing, another suicide bomber kills five Israelis on board a bus in Hadera. Twenty-nine are wounded.

MAY (Iyar/Sivan)

• Israel agrees to allow the printing of postal stamps and travel documents bearing the seal of the Palestinian Authority. The concessions are part of an 180-page peace agreement signed in Cairo. The proceedings are marred when PLO leader Yasser Arafat refuses to sign maps outlining the proposed size of Jericho. After a brief halt, the papers are signed.

Some 330 Palestinian police, meanwhile, gather in the Egyptian border town of Rafiah awaiting Arafat's go-ahead to take over Israel Defence Force postings in Gaza. They wait one week to move into the 30 posts and begin policing the area.

• Breakaway Labor politician Haim Ramon becomes head of Israel's massive Histadrut labor federation. Ramon, the former health minister, left Labor when the party torpedoed his proposed national health reform bill. As Histadrut chief, he plans to go ahead with the reforms by cutting the link between the federation and its mammoth and troubled health fund.

• Quebec agrees to allow 100 Jewish families from the former Soviet Union to emigrate to Montreal. The agreement, which would see the first families arriving by October 1995, was the second such between the Quebec government and the local Jewish community. Over 80 families arrived after the April 1992 accord.

• PLO Chairman Yasser Arafat puts his foot in it by calling for a jihad (holy war) to regain Jerusalem. He later explains that the remark, made in a South African mosque, really meant only "a peaceful crusade." Jewish leaders don't buy it.

• Righteous Gentile Jan Karski, 80, is made an honorary citizen of Israel in Washington, D.C., a first for an American. As a Polish underground fighter, Karski was the first to give an eyewitness account of Jewish massacres in 1942, when he told Poland's government-in-exile and British Prime Minister Winston Churchill what he had seen in the Warsaw Ghetto and Izbica transit camp. "This is the proudest and most meaningful day of my life," he says.

• Former U.S. president Richard Nixon is revealed as a bigot and anti-Semite in the diaries of his one-time chief of staff. Nixon, who died April 22, told the late H.R. Haldeman of his belief in "total Jewish domination of the media." This theory, and others, were openly expressed before Secretary of State Henry Kissinger, a Jew.

• Klaus Barbie's right-hand man and at least four other Nazi collaborators are revealed to have been sponsored as "French political refugees" by Quebec nationalists after World War II. In 1946 Jacques Duge, also known as the Comte de Bernonville, arrived in Quebec through the sponsorship of Roman Catholic Church leaders and right-wing politicians. He eventually fled to Brazil to avoid extradition after being sentenced to death in absentia by a French court in 1947. He was found murdered there in 1972.

• Convicted spy Jonathan Pollard marries longtime fiancee and unflagging supporter Elaine Zeitz in a North Carolina prison. Pollard is serving a life sentence after pleading guilty in 1987 to passing American security secrets to Israel. In March, President Bill Clinton denied Pollard clemency, saying the former navy analyst caused "considerable damage" to his country.

JUNE (Sivan/Tamuz)

• Royal Canadian Legion convention delegates vote three-to-one against a proposed by-law allowing religious headgear in Legion canteens, saying Sikh turbans and Jewish kippot must be removed to show respect for the dead. The vote comes days after Jewish veterans are honored by the Canadian Armed Forces. Roughly 16,000 Canadian Jews served in World War II.

• An international group of 100 gay and lesbian activists are attacked by protestors at a Yad Vashem prayer service for homosexuals killed in the Holocaust. The ceremony opened a month of gay events in Israel.

• Canada antes up for its first ever binational research fund, pledging $3 million over three years to develop hi-tech joint ventures with Israel. Up to 50 projects a year are expected to make use of the fund's research money.

• Israeli's former chief Ashkenazi rabbi issues a halachic ruling calling for the death of PLO Chairman Yasser Arafat. Rabbi Shlomo Goren finds that as a rodef (one who pursues or persecutes to death), "every Jew is commanded to kill [Arafat] because of the verse 'don't stand idly by the blood of your neighbor.' " The unique pronouncement is greeted as "crazy" by Environment Minister Yossi Sarid.

• McDonald's recently opened Israeli restaurant is dealt a Whopper of a blow when Burger King opens two outlets in the country, including a strictly kosher one in Jerusalem's Malha Mall. Burger King says it plans to open 48 restaurants in Israel over the next five years.

• An official commission finds Dr. Baruch Goldstein was solely responsible for February's Hebron mosque massacre. The inquiry rules that despite lax security the day of the killings, government officials and senior army officers were not negligent. The government quickly adopts a recommendation to bar off-duty soldiers and settlers carrying arms from the Tomb of the Patriarchs, sacred to Jews and Muslims. At least 29 Palestinian worshippers were killed by Goldstein.

• Neo-Nazi Heritage Front leader Wolfgang Droege is sentenced to two months in jail for ignoring an October court order to shut down a racist telephone hotline. Two other men get jail time, and the Heritage Front is fined the maximum $5,000 for contempt of court. Droege later appeals.

• Former prime minister Brian Mulroney is awarded an honorary PhD by Tel Aviv University in Montreal. Mulroney tells 450 guests "I shall never regret any of the statements I made or decisions I took" with regard to Israel and to the Canadian Jewish community.

• The Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto releases its report on Jewish continuity, in which family life education, young adults and Jewish education are seen as priorities for the community to maintain viability. The report, prepared over two years by the Task Force on Jewish Continuity, recommends spending at least $1.2 million a year to meet its goals.

• American Michael Fay, 19, is given four strokes of the cane on his bare buttocks for vandalizing cars in Singapore. Fay, whose paternal grandparents are Holocaust survivors, thanks the people of Israel for helping to appeal his sentence. The case had generated much public interest in Israel.

JULY (Tamuz/Av)

• Former Austrian president and suspected war criminal Kurt Waldheim accepts a papal knighthood in Vienna. The Vatican bestows the Order of Pius IX on Waldheim, 75, in recognition of his work as United Nations secretary-general from 1972 to 1982.

• PLO Chairman Yasser Arafat visits Gaza, drawing out more Israeli protestors than Palestinian supporters. Close to 100,000 mainly religious Jews swell a Jerusalem rally, while stands specially constructed for Arafat's visit in Gaza City are unfilled by 80,000 spectators.

• Toronto's Jewish Community Centre pleads for help, saying it is on the verge of bankruptcy. None of the 275 JCCs in North American have ever gone under. Thanks to a last-minute cash reprieve from the Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto, its three branches will stay open.

• A bomb blast levels the main Jewish communal building in Buenos Aires, Argentina, killing about 100 people. Iranian diplomats are suspected. In Panama, 12 Jews are among 21 killed when a bomb explodes the next day aboard a Panamanian jet.

More than 150,000 people turn out in support of the Argentine Jewish community at a Buenos Aires rally, the country's largest mass demonstration in 10 years.

The two bombings are believed linked, as are the two explosions in London, England that damage the Israeli Embassy and the building housing the Joint Israel Appeal eight days later.

• The White House lawn once more is the scene of an historic declaration when Israel and Jordan sign a non-belligerency pact, ending their 46-year state of war. The warm handshake between Israeli Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin and Jordan's King Hussein is just one of many firsts for the two countries: within two weeks King Hussein flies over Jerusalem, the first time a Jordanian jet is allowed into Israeli airspace; Israeli President Ezer Weizman inaugurates a telephone link between the two countries with a friendly call to the palace in Amman; and the border is opened between Eilat and Aqaba, allowing foreign tourists free travel.

• The Berlin Document Centre, home of the Nazi Party archives, is returned to German control after being in American hands since 1945. The archives contain more than 550,000 Nazi personal documents and 11 million party membership cards.

AUGUST (Av/Elul)

• Israel makes a rare admission in saying the jet bombing of a Lebanese house was a mistake. The bomb killed 10 civilians in Deir Zahrani, a Shia Muslim village. The government apologizes for the attack, saying the bomb missed its target.

• An Israeli mobile army surgical hospital is up and running in Goma, Zaire within 24 hours to help Rwandan refugees devastated by illness and civil war. The MASH unit, staffed by 80 army medical personnel and including X-ray facilities, is part of international relief efforts. The cost of running the unit is estimated at between $16 million and $20 million (US).

MILESTONES

Underground hero Bruce Teicholz dies in New York Sept. 7 at 79. A native of Lvov, Teicholz refused a 1942 Nazi appointment to head the city's Judenrat, and escaped to become a partisan fighter. Captured, he escaped once again and as head of Budapest's Jewish underground helped Swedish diplomat Raoul Wallenberg save Jews.

Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care founding president Abe Posluns dies Sept. 25 in Toronto at 84. Saying he always kept in mind what he would have wanted for his own mother, Posluns was behind the 1940 decision to move the Jewish Home for the Aged from Cecil Street to the then-growing Jewish area of Bathurst Street so children could be near their aged parents.

International fraternal organization B'nai Brith turns 150 Oct. 13. Canadian lodges were started in 1875 in Toronto and in Montreal in 1881. B'nai Brith Canada claims 10,000 members in 73 lodges.

Education benefactor Sol Lederman dies Nov. 12 in his Toronto home. He was 74. In 1976, Lederman and Rabbi David Hartman found the Jerusalem-based Shalom Hartman Institute, where high school students and teachers alike study Talmud and Halachah in the Orthodox tradition. Lederman also co-founded the Coinamatic Group of coin-operated washers and dryers in 1946.

Philanthropist Monroe Abbey dies in Montreal Nov. 29 at 89. Abbey, a former national president of Canadian Jewish Congress (1968-1972), was the father of Liberal MP Sheila Finestone.

Former Argentine Conservative Rabbi Marshall Meyer dies of liver cancer in New York Dec. 2. He was 63. Rabbi Meyer, whose fiery oratorical style invigorated Jewish life in Buenos Aires, was most recently spiritual leader of Manhattan's B'nai Jeshurun Congregation.

Yiddish award-winning author Szloma Renglich dies in Montreal Dec. 26 at 81. The Polish-born writer chronicled his life in pre-war Lublin and Warsaw in When Paupers Dance and its sequel, In the Heart of Warsaw.

Israeli folksinger Beni Amdurski dies in Tel Aviv Jan. 23 of cancer. He was 63. Dudaim partner Yisrael Gurion and dozens of others pay their last respects in Tel Aviv's Cameri Theatre.

Microbiologist Hannah Farkas-Himsely dies of cancer in Jerusalem Jan. 24. She was 76. Farkas-Himsely isolated anti-cancer proteins in the body that are now being tested on psoriasis and skin cancer.

Righteous Gentile Guelfo Zamboni dies in Rome March 5 at age 97. Zamboni was the Italian consul in Salonika, Greece, in 1943 when the Nazis began deporting the city's 55,000 Jews. He saved 280 with false papers, for which he was recognized by Yad Vashem in 1992.

Canadian Jewish Congress turns 75 March 16. The "Parliament for Canadian Jewry" has worked for three-quarters of a century to bring Jews across Canada together, to support Israel and to champion human rights.

Journalist Michael Solomon dies in Montreal March 18 at 84. Solomon, a Romanian who worked for British intelligence during the war, spent 17 years in Soviet and Romanian prisons as an accused spy. He came to Canada after being freed in 1965 and resumed his pre-war newspaper career, later turning to writing books.

Renowned Torah scholar Rabbi Abraham Price dies March 31 in Toronto at 94. Rabbi Price became head of Toronto's Chevra Shas (now Yeshiva Torath Chaim) after his escape from Europe in 1939.

Montreal's bagel king Mayer Lewkowicz dies April 11 at 65. Loyal fans insist Lewkowicz's brick-fired St. Viateur bagels are the only ones worthy of the name.

Deli legend Israel (Izzy) Shopsowitz dies of a heart attack April 22 in Toronto. He was 71. Shopsowitz, son of Shopsy's founders Jenny and Harry Shopsowitz, sold the family business with brother Sam in 1972. He returned to the flagship restaurant on Front Street in 1991 as a consultant.

Romanian Chief Rabbi Moses Rosen dies in Bucharest May 6. He was 81. Chief rabbi since 1948, Rabbi Rosen organized a mass exodus of 400,000 Romanian Jews to Israel; 18,000 Jews now remain. Rabbi Rosen is buried in Jerusalem.

Former Israel Defence Force chief of staff Haim Bar-Lev dies in Tel Aviv May 8. The fortification line at the Suez Canal was built during his tenure as IDF chief from 1968 to 1971. During the 1973 Yom Kippur War the Bar-Lev Line was breached by Egyptian troops. Bar-Lev was most recently Israel's ambassador to Moscow.

Israeli navy creator Paul Shulman dies May 16 in Jerusalem at 72. Shulman was the former U.S. navy officer charged by David Ben-Gurion to set up and command Israel's navy in November 1948. He had helped smuggle Jewish refugess into Israel before going on to capture Ein Gedi during Israel's War of Independence.

The seventh Lubavitcher Rebbe Menachem Mendel Schneerson dies in Manhattan June 12. He was 92. The rebbe, who had suffered two strokes since 1992, did not appoint a successor to lead the 250,000 Chabad Chassidim worldwide, many of whom believed he was the messiah. He is buried in Crown Heights near his wife Chaya Moussia and beside his father-in-law Rabbi Yosef Yitzchak Schneersohn, the sixth Lubavitcher rebbe.

Klausenberger rebbe and Laniado Hospital founder Rabbi Yekutiel Yehuda Halberstam dies in Netanya June 19. He was 90. Rabbi Halberstam was head of the chassidic Sanz dynasty in New Jersey and Kiryat Sanz.

The words "the House of David" are clearly inscribed on this ninth Century BCE basalt victory stele discovered in Israel at the Tel Dan excavations in the Upper Galilee. [Photo: Nahum Slapak/Israel Museum]

Inscription helps unlock past secrets

Jerusalem Dateline

A unique inscription mentioning the "House of David" was discovered in Israel in the excavations of the ancient city of Dan. This is the first extra-biblical reference to King David ever to come to light.

The inscription is part of a victory stele apparently erected by one of the kings of Aram, relating his triumphs over his enemies. The reference to the Davidic dynasty suggests that a king of Judah was involved in the events described.

The fragmentary inscription may be interpreted on the basis of a biblical account of King Asa of Judah, who bribed King Ben-Hadad of Aram to attack the King of Israel:

"There was a war between Asa and King Baasha of Israel. . . So Asa took all the silver and gold. . .and sent them to King Ben-Hadad. . .of Aram. . . Ben-Hadad responded. . . He sent his army commanders against the towns of Israel and captured Ijon, Dan, Abel-beth-maacah. . ." (1 Kings 15:16-20)

The inscription is written in Aramaic. It was engraved in alphabetic script on a large stone which had been smoothed for writing. The words are separated by dots. Only thirteen lines of the original text have survived.

The stele was smashed in ancient times, and this fragment was found in secondary use near the outer gate of the city. It is the first monumental inscription from the First Temple period to be discovered in Israel, as apparently, it was not common for the kings of Judah and Israel to erect monuments in their own honor.

Treating glaucoma

Jerusalem Dateline

A novel methodology that may eventually be used for treating glaucoma, a leading cause of blindness, has been developed by scientists at Israel's Weizmann Institute.

The treatment is expected to alleviate the condition through a simple procedure based on an enzyme that does the work of a surgical knife.

Glaucoma afflicts an estimated two per cent of the world's adult population and is prevalent among the elderly.

The condition occurs when the flow of eye fluid known as aqueous humor is obstructed, causing an increase in intra-ocular pressure. This excessive pressure may damage the intra-ocular portion of the optic nerve, leading to impaired vision and, if untreated, to blindness.

There is no known cure for glaucoma, but various treatments may alleviate the intra-ocular pressure by either reducing the inflow or increasing the outflow of aqueous humor in the eye. However, the standard procedures — which include drugs as the first choice, followed by laser treatment and finally conventional surgery — all have major shortcomings.

The new technique, developed by Prof. Arieh Yaron and eye surgeon Dr. Jacob Dan, is based on the application of a specific enzyme called collagenase to a small, well-defined area of the sclera by means of a specially designed delivery system. This enzyme selectively destroys collagen, a protein that forms the basis of this hard coat of the eye. But unlike conventional surgery, in which a piece of the sclera is actually cut out and removed, the enzyme only thins the layer, forming a filter through which the fluid can drain.

This minumally invasive procedure limits the development of scar tissue and should prevent the complications associated with conventional surgery. Moreover, the researchers anticipate virtually no risk of blindness, impaired vision or cataract formation, all of which can occur with conventional treatments.

It should be emphasized that even if initial clinical trials are authorized and prove successful, it will still be some years until the procedure becomes generally available.

Cuban Jew to become rabbi

By ELIAS LEVY
CJN Staff Reporter

In about five years, an orthodox Sephardi will be the first Cuban-born rabbi since the revolution of 1959.

David Said Levy, 23, is the first Jewish Cuban student ever to receive special authorization from the U.S. State Department, allowing him to begin rabbinic studies at Yeshiva University in New York last September.

In an interview with The CJN, Levy explained that "the small but vibrant" Jewish community of about 1,300 in Cuba, one of the last bastions of communism, is not like other Jewish communities living under an autocratic regime.

"In spite of the host of pessimistic and even apocalyptic conjectures which people continue to make about the future of my community, I can assure you that the community is not in the process of disintegration.

"On the contrary," he said, "since the late '80s, we have seen an impressive revival of Jewish community life. More and more young Cubans are practising their religion without restrictions and are very proudly assuming their Jewish cultural identity."

According to Levy, the Jews of Cuba have "never been victims of any form of official discrimination. Jews have always been completely integrated into Cuban society at all levels. . .

"The first Jew to set foot on the soil of Cuba was Luis de Torres, interpreter to Christopher Columbus," he said.

"The Jews who fled the Inquisition continued to populate the island, and at the end of the 18th century, they made a major contribution towards the establishment of what, a few decades later, would become the very prosperous Cuban sugar cane industry," Levy added.

Fifteen thousand Jews were living in Cuba before Fidel Castro's coup d'etat. By 1989, 93 per cent of Cuban Jews had emigrated, mainly to the United States.

The last rabbi officially practising on the island left for good in the '60s. The last bar mitzvah was celebrated in 1973; the last Jewish marriage in 1976. Circumcision was almost never practised because there was no longer a qualified mohel. The number of mixed marriages increased unhindered at an incredible rate.

"Since the '90s began, things have changed radically," said Levy, who worked as a technician in the National Cuban Telephone Company and taught Hebrew and Talmud to 50 adolescents in his community every Sunday morning.

The organized Jewish community of Cuba currently has two very active Ashkenazi synagogues — Adat Israel and another established in the Patronato, the Jewish Community Centre of Havana.

The only Sephardi synagogue in gation in the heart of the Old City, is much less busy.

"This old religious edifice. . .must be restored at all costs. The building is in a sorry state. Nevertheless, its doors always remain open," said Levy.

"Most of the Sephardim, or about 50 per cent of the community, usually attend religious services held in the two Ashkenazi synagogues. This does not present any problem. We are a very unified community."

The youth movement, which has been inactive for almost a decade because of a glaring lack of young leaders willing to take over, is making plans again.

"The movement currently has about 60 active members who meet every week to socialize with other Jewish young people and to learn Israeli songs and dances."

Jewish women in Cuba have also become organized. "In January 1993, these dedicated volunteers formed a women's association which now has more than 70 members," he said.

"They have implemented an effective service for home visits to help the aged, the chronically ill and the disabled of our community. They also organize collections of medications which have become an extremely rare commodity on the island. Their association operates under the aegis of the Patronato which is also the official authority representing our community with the government of Fidel Castro."

Several informed observers and analysts of the socio-political scene in Cuba state that two major events in 1991 greatly contributed to the revival of Jewish life: the easing of the militant atheism of the Castro regime and the increasingly conspicuous presence of a number of international Jewish organizations.

The program Levy is now taking at Yeshiva University gives him training as rabbi, mohel and shochet. The entire Jewish community of Cuba has high hopes for him.

"As soon as I have completed my rabbinic studies, I will return to Cuba in order to be with my family and to serve my people. I hope that this degree will also allow me to train future Cuban community leaders right in Havana," he said.

Levy received a visa to live in the United States as a result of the efforts of Rabbi Mitchell Serels (formerly of Toronto), director of the Jacob E. Safra Institute of Sephardi Studies of Yeshiva University, and Jerrold Nadler, Democratic congressman for New York State, who negotiated between the Clinton administration and Cuban government authorities.

This is an abridged version of an article which appeared earlier in the Montreal edition of CJN in French. The interview with David Said Levy was conducted in Spanish. Translation by CJN staff.

Narcotics seen harmful to sexual capacities of male children

Jerusalem Dateline

Women who take narcotics during pregnancy are likely to cause harm to the sexual capacities of their male children, research conducted at the Hebrew University of Jerusalem indicates.

The research was undertaken with pregnant rats who were fed narcotic drugs. The male offspring of these rats were found to have impaired sexual function and enhanced female traits upon reaching maturity.

These findings point to possible similar consequences for humans, who have some physiological similarities to rats. But the researchers stress that human sexual activity is much more complex than that of rats and therefore one must be cautious in drawing conclusions.

Research concluded in the 1970s in various parts of the world showed that one could influence sexual behavior in rats by exposing them to certain opiates (such as morphine and heroin) during their prenatal development.

The drugs mimic the effects of materials produced in the brain called endogenous opioid peptides, which have a variety of functions, including those connected with the development of males' sexual behavior.

The scientists believe that the use by pregnant mothers of those drugs which mimic these natural sexual behavior-inducing materials can cause substantial, irreversible damage to the sexual development of the embryo.

Machon Meir caters to Israel's diversity

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

Canadian students, along with thousands of others from around the world — many from the Soviet Union and Ethiopia and many without any exposure to traditional Judaism, have attended Machon Meir.

Recognizing the diversity in Israel and the many countries of the Diaspora, Machon has developed programs to meet a variety of needs.

More than 400 students attend Machon Meir, where each student is free to choose the program and classes most suited to his individual needs.

Machon Meir's sister school, Machon Ora, provides the same variety of programs for over 100 young women.

There are programs for Israelis as well as special programs for English, French and Russian speaking students. Some 80 per cent of Machon's overseas students remain in Israel after completing their studies.

Avigdor Chen (Victor Simon), a graduate of the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto, studied at Machon Meir as part of his teaching degree. He served as a tankist in the war in Lebanon.

The son of the late Murray and Cookie Simon of Toronto, Chen now lives in Israel. Married with four children, he lives in Mitzpeh Navo, a neighborhood in Ma'ale Adumim, has left teaching and is now a partner in an aluminum business.

He says that Machon Meir succeeds in building a sense of Jewish identity through its ties to Israel.

"The only way Jews can remain strong in the non-Jewish environment of the Diaspora," says Chen, "is by being connected to a Torah centre in Israel like Machon Meir, dedicated to the survival of Jews all over the world."

Machon Meir is located on a tree-lined boulevard in Kiryat Moshe, in the heart of Jerusalem.

Its courses include multi-level Talmud classes in Tanach and biblical geography, Jewish law (Halachah) and Aggadah, Jewish philosophy and the logic of the commandments, tefillah, Jewish history, an introduction to chassidic writings, and the teachings of Rav Avraham Yitzchak Kook, the first Chief Rabbi of Israel.

A teacher's degree in Jewish education includes courses in child psychology, Jewish history, group dynamics and modern Hebrew.

The ulpan program, administered by the Ministry of Education, is designed for beginners or advanced students. College credits are available for some universities in the United States and Israel, including Yeshiva University and Bar-Ilan in Tel Aviv.

Rabbi Dov Bigon

Israeli-born Rabbi Dov Bigon, who is the founder and rosh yeshivah of Machon, grew up in a non-religious environment and lived on Kibbutz Mishmar Hasharon.

He fought in several of Israel's wars and his paratroop unit was among the liberators of Jerusalem during the Six Day War. As a young adult, he began to study traditional Judaism and was ordained as a rabbi. At the same time, he became very learned in the geography of the Bible.

Rabbi Bigon's pride in the State of Israel and his love for his fellow man permeate the yeshivah. Students are encouraged to integrate into society. Machon views serving in the Israel Defence Forces as an ethical obligation no less than a national one.

Machon offers a program for students from non-traditional backgrounds who are seeking to discover their Jewish heritage. New immigrants discover their Judaism and integrate into Israeli society.

Machon provided the first program in Israel to train the first generation of Ethiopian rabbis and community leaders.

Both Machon Meir and Machon Ora students work in volunteer and outreach programs at hospitals, community centres, senior citizen homes, and orphanages. Along with the chesed programs, extra-curricular activities include tours, sports programs and adopt-a-family.

The number of students has been growing each year and Machon now rents additional apartments in the neighborhood. Plans for a new building adjacent to the existing building will include a well-stocked library which will seat 100 students, a new beit midrash and synagogue which will seat more than 450 students, additional administrative offices and a recreation room where the students will be able to relax.

For more information on Machon Meir or Machon Ora, write to 12 Hameiri Ave., Jerusalem 91032, Israel.

Frozen fish sperm useful to breeders

Jerusalem Dateline

Ornamental fish are proving an attractive proposition in more ways than one for Israeli breeders. Using innovative preservation techniques, they have been freezing fish sperm to lucrative effect.

Scientists at the Ma'agan Michael Fish Breeding Centre, in collaboration with the Israel Oceanographic and Limnological Institute in Haifa, and with the commercial acumen of the Yozmot Granot Initiative Center in Emeq Hefer north of Tel Aviv, have set up a company called Spermnity — Fish Sperm Crytopreservation Services Limited.

Spermnity is the only frozen fish sperm bank in the world. It will eventually allow breeders to achieve the desired shape, size and combination of colors they want in their fish, as well as immunity against disease.

The Israeli researchers have focused their attention on the popular Japanese koi fish. A large koi can measure up to 80 centimetres (2.6 feet) and fetch thousands of dollars in pet shops worldwide. The koi is also highly sought after because of its longevity; there are unproven claims of kois living for more than 300 years.

"We want breeders," says project director Yonathan Klebanov, "to be able to select the size and color of the fish they want. Just as important, we want to ensure that the fish are disease-free so that when a customer invests a lot of money in a koi, it won't die on him as he takes it home."

The cultivated fish sperm project in Israel is based on computer-aided breeding programs. There is no danger of transmitting diseases when handling frozen sperm, it can be easily transported, and will keep indefinitely.

Klebanov and his fellow researchers have already increased fertilization rates for the koi to above 70 per cent, compared to 50 per cent under the best laboratory conditions elsewhere.

A woman's head was recently discovered, depicted in a corner of a mosaic floor in the ancient city of Tiberias. [Photo: Joel Fishman]

Woman's kiss stands the test of time

Jerusalem Dateline

Her lips are puckered to kiss the grapes on the vines or to blow the clouds across the sky. She is the lady of Mount Berenice.

Her head, depicted in the corner of a mosaic floor, was recently discovered by archaeologists of the Israel Antiquities Authority near Tiberias in Israel.

"The face of a woman in a corner is very rare. Possibly an artisan from North Africa created this one," said Yizhar Hirschfeld, director of excavations of the ancient city of Tiberias, just south of Israel's modern city.

Another well-known mosaic of a woman's face, the Mona Lisa of Galilee, was found in the town of Tzipori (Sepphoris) and is now displayed in the entrance of the Israel Museum in Jerusalem. that face, however, was not in a corner position, Hirschfeld said.

The wreath-bedecked Mount Berenice head is four times life-size. It forms part of the floor of a late sixth-century Byzantine pilgrims' hospice, the first found in Galilee.

Hirschfeld surmised that the head represents one of the four seasons or one of the four winds. The other corners of the mosaic, however, have not been preserved.

Israeli firm develops simple AIDS test

Jerusalem Dateline

An Israeli medical diagnostics firm, Orgenics Ltd., has developed a quick, simple and safe test for AIDS.

The test is the most recent in a series of sophisticated but simple kits developed by the 12-year-old company under the trademark ImmunoComb.

The two-part kit looks like a comb of detachable cardboard teeth-like dipsticks and a small network of pre-filled wells containing analytic solutions for between 12 and 36 individual tests, called a developing plate. In actuality, despite their size and simplicity, each kit is a complex configuration that meshes enzyme-immunology principles with innovative biotechnology.

All of Orgenics' diagnostic kits can be administered by untrained personnel with no extensive instruction and without the aid of sophisticated lab equipment.

Successful tests on the company's newest AIDS kit have just been concluded. They have proven to provide highly reliable results within five minutes; other mobile kits on the market take 40 minutes to assay individual test samples.

The real breakthrough in this new AIDS kit, however, is that it requires no blood specimens. It is the first test available in the world based on the analysis of saliva — a body fluid that contains antibodies to the AIDS virus but does not contain the virus itself; so it does not constitute a potential danger to handling test material.

The development of diagnostic kits of this kind has not only been in response to concern among medical and paramedical workers of contamination from infected blood samples; it has also responded to changing needs, including the need to decentralize testing facilities with on-the-spot, rapid, reliable and simple testing and screening procedures for potential blood donors, and the growing need for mass screening of high-risk populations.

Jerusalem zoo brings animals to public

By LISA SAMIN

The animals boarded Noah's Ark two by two. At the new Tisch Family Biblical Zoological Gardens in Jerusalem recently opened to the public, that bit of foresight is much appreciated. Chief veterinarian and assistant director Dr. Gabi Eshkar is hoping to exhibit as many of these biblical animals as can be found, a number of near extinct animals, and the largest bird sanctuary in Israel.

The zoo, which has been in planning for 10 years, is a far cry from its across-town predecessor in the Jerusalem neighborhood of Romema. Small, run-down, and extremely restrictive, the zoo "was a very depressing place," says Jerusalemite Na'ama Cohen on a visit to the new, spacious facility.

"The new zoo is a $19 million venture," says assistant administrative director Rafi Rozenes. "We sold the former zoo's land, bought 60 acres of land in up-and-coming Malha, and built a Garden of Eden for animals."

Brought from as close as Romema and as far as Madagascar, the animals were all born in captivity. "Putting wild animals in cages is cruel," says Eshkar. "We not only abide by worldwide rules governing treatment of animals, we also aim to educate the Israeli public on this subject."

Free of high fences and cages, water is the only natural barrier separating most animals from visitors. "It was amazing to see the animals so close," says Elizabeth Shavin, a mother of three toddlers, of her recent visit. "My son and a chimp were nose-to-nose, and he hasn't stopped talking about it."

Rozenes and Eshkar both stress the fact that the zoo is running on a trial basis. Only 50 percent of the exhibits are completed and the official opening is expected some time this summer. Nonetheless, visitors are pouring into the park by the thousands. "Four thousand people came in one weekend," says Eshkar. "That's more than we had in months at the old zoo." And on a peak day during the recent Pesach holidays, there were an astonishing 30,000 visitors.

Malka Nir and her 2-year-old son, Ofer, were among the park's first visitors on a recent Friday morning. After an hour's tour Malka smiles, "I've been to zoos all over Europe but this is fantastic. It fits the personality of Jerusalem by combining the biblical with the modern."

Sculpted into the southern mountains of Jerusalem, the gardens are a portrait of calm and pastoral beauty. Waterfowl rest amid lush foliage in a large central pond surrounded by grassy lawns and a waterfall, and monkeys inhabit a number of small islands.

The zoo's hillside layout is "user-friendly," designed for comfort and convenience and equipped with regular rest and refreshment areas. Shavin still complains that "with two children in a stroller and one walking it was quite exhausting."

A catalogue in English is in preparation, but in the meantime a limited English brochure must suffice. Signs in Hebrew and Arabic provide information on the animals' origins and habits, and the biblical passage in which each individual animal is mentioned.

Supported by the Jerusalem Municipality, the Jerusalem Development Authority, the ministry of tourism and the Jerusalem Foundation — which resulted in the Tisch Family's sponsorship — the major movers in this venture were former zoo director Uri Marom; Uri Wexler of the Jerusalem Development Authority; chief caretaker Itzik Yedid; and Eshkar.

For the animals, adjusting to their new-found freedom was nothing short of traumatic. "We had to put all the animals to sleep in order to move them," recalls Eshkar. "And it took them a good few weeks to adapt to their new home. The chimpanzees, for example, were used to living in cages on cement floors. They found walking on grass a frightening experience at first."

Bringing the current 29 species of mammals and 68 species of birds to Jerusalem took five years. "But this is only the beginning," says Eshkar. "When the aviary opens, we're hoping to bring another 100 species of birds."

And what about feeding? The animals, including the hippopotamus who eats 30-40 kilos (65-90 pounds) of fruit, vegetables and hay daily, receive the choicest fare from local five-star hotels and restaurants — for free. This happens because the 10 percent tithe, demanded by Jewish religious law from all food establishments which strictly observe kashrut, is donated to the zoo. (Without a temple or kohanim [priests], the tithe must be buried or given to animals).

A safari-like adventure area covering the zoo's eastern hillside is in preparation, as is an imaginative play area for children and a petting zoo, complete with pony rides. An amphitheatre will offer educational programs and entertainment for visitors and groups.

Down the line are possible plans for an electrically-run train which would wind throughout the park carrying visitors.

"We have combined love and respect for animals with education, religion and esthetics to make this the zoo for the year 2,000," says Eshkar. "And here, in Jerusalem, all these elements merge in an extraordinary mosaic of all God's creatures." (WZPS)

'Artificial windows' aid elderly patients

Jerusalem Dateline

Physicians at Tel Aviv's Elias Sourasky Medical Centre have designed "artificial windows" to prevent disorientation among patients in dimly lit and windowless intensive care units.

Elderly patients, plunged into an unfamiliar environment where they have no time reference — not even a sense of day or night — tend to lose their grip on reality.

In some hospitals around the world, physicians have attempted to address this problem by installing lighted view boxes with murals of scenes such as a wooded hillside. Sometimes these scenes are linked to a timer and set to reflect the time of day.

However, staff at the Israeli hospital noted that even in a pastoral scene, there should be some action, such as clouds moving in the sky or a bird flying by. The view box lacked a dynamic dimension.

The hospital staff decided to enhance the patient's environment with a more innovative solution which, unlike the view box, is both dynamic and real.

The term "artificial window" is somewhat misleading; the "window" is actually closer to a bedside wide-angle periscope to the outside world.

With an Israeli electronic and video firm, the staff of the cardiology department designed and installed a system which provides patients with a touchstone to life beyond the intensive care unit, one that offers a constantly changing picture of normalcy and a corner of reality.

The system — made possible through a $100,000 contribution by a private Israeli philanthropist — employs a color video camera mounted on the roof of the hospital, which records a panorama of the busy street entrance to the hospital online, 24 hours a day.

The scene of actual pedestrian movement, of ambulances entering the hospital compound and traffic on the street is then projected onto a 1.5 to 2-square meter opaque double glass "screen" installed like a window in a hole in the wall between adjoining intensive care units in the cardiology department.

The scene, which can be seen on both sides of the "artificial window" like a color film transparency, is shown via a projector hidden in the ceiling of one of the matching units. Patients can thus tell whether it is midday or midnight, and they have both a source of stimulation and a link to reality.

"The importance of stimulation and familiar points of reference to mental well-being has been well documented," says Prof. Shlomo Laniado, head of the hospital's cardiology department and the moving force behind the "artificial windows."

Patients who find themselves hospitalized for days in intensive cardiac care units tend to show signs of disorientation and even psychotic behavior. This is particularly acute in elderly patients, says the cardiologist.

In regular intensive care units, the patient is often in a stupor or sedated, so disorientation is not a particular problem. In cardiac units, however, patients are fully conscious; yet when incapacitated and confined to semi-darkened rooms, they can lose touch with reality.

The most common symptom is insomnia during the night due to confusion about whether it is night or day and lack of stimulation. For some, disorientation is more marked. Laniado cites as an example an elderly physician who, after three days in intensive care, failed to recognize his own wife and daughter.

Disorientation makes it difficult for medical staff to assess the medical status of the patient.

"It's a bad situation even from a purely medical point of view," says Laniado. "Disoriented patients have difficulty cooperating with the staff treating their illness."

But, he adds, sometimes those most distressed by disorientation are the patient's relatives. "Disorientation of this kind is temporary," stresses Laniado. "Once a patient leaves an intensive care unit and returns to a familiar environment, he begins to function normally."

In the meantime, disorientation is particularly stressful for relatives who must cope not only with the shock of the illness itself, but also with a relative who may seem to be losing his mind, says Laniado.

While the hospital has not done controlled clinical studies regarding the effectiveness of the cardiac unit's "artificial windows," the general impression is very positive among both patients and staff.

"The system seems to have a beneficial effect," says Laniado. The only complaints have been from some younger patients, he says. They've suggested that if the aim is to provide patients with stimulation, staff should relocate the cameras to Tel Aviv's crowded beachfront!

South America's Jews

By ESTHER WEINRIB
Special to The CJN

The history of Jews in Ecuador began at the same time as the history of the Spanish in that area. Jews arrived with the Spanish explorers because this was the era of the Spanish Inquisition. It is now widely believed that several of Christopher Columbus' crew were Jewish. Some once thought that Columbus himself may have been a Jew.

Ecuador today is a conglomerate of original natives, Spanish, and other ethnic groups — Black, Chinese, Jews and recently Arabs. My entry to the Jewish community was through the Isacovici family — Solomon and Frida, their children Roberto, Ricardo and Daisy, and their grandchildren.

In the 1920s, Jews began coming to Ecuador, Colombia and Peru from Romania and Czechoslovakia. In the 1930s about 3,500 German Jews arrived; many of them left in the 50s and 60s for New York and some even returned to Germany. A few became wealthy bankers in Colombia.

The next wave of immigration was in the late 40s, as Ecuador allowed Jews in without a visa. Some used Ecuador as a stepping stone to other countries, such as Venezuela, Colombia and Bolivia, which had not allowed free entry.

There are now three families in Cuenca, 12 in Guayaquil and about 210 in Quito.

The impetus to move to Quito came when a San Franciscan monk attempted to persuade the elder son to attend church. In Quito, Isacavici continued to peddle, and eventually established a textile factory and retail store. Frida is very active in the store and the whole family — children and grandchildren — all help out in busy periods.

Another Jewish couple in Ecuador is Simon Prutschi and his wife, who had been a pediatrician. Their nephew, Manuel Prutschi, is executive director of Canadian Jewish Congress, Ontario region.

Most adults in Quito are active in community work for the Temple or in community services.

The temple is a square white building with a blue Magen David. A high fence and a guard are in evidence, although there is no anti-Semitism. (Most businesses have private security.) Services are in Hebrew and Ashkenazic in style. The rabbi performs shechita for those who want it. Kosher food is beginning to be imported. A mohel is brought from Colombia when needed.

There is a home for the aged on the synagogue grounds for those who can look after themselves — much like the Terrace at the Baycrest Centre.

Herbs used to help fight migraines

World Zionist Press Service

For centuries, herbal remedies have been used to cure a wide assortment of ailments. In fact, the miracle drug aspirin was first extracted from a willow tree, and digitalis, used to regulate the heartbeat, is derived from the foxglove plant.

Research in England and Israel on the flowering yellow-green leafy plant feverfew, has recently proven its effectiveness in reducing the incidence and severity of migraine headache. Galilee Herbal Remedies of Kibbutz Kfar Hanassi has now begun producing and exporting what many consider the most effective feverfew on the world market.

One of the first to recognize the effects of feverfew was Dr. Stewart Johnson of the London Migraine Clinic. He conducted clinical trials to substantiate the claims that chewing feverfew leaves in the morning alleviates migraines.

Prof. Dan Palevitch, a researcher on medicinal herbs at Israel's Volcani Centre at Beit Dagan; Prof. Rafi Carasso of Gedera Hospital; and Dr. Gideon Earon, head of the Pain Clinic in Jaffa, have also found significant positive results in the clinical testing of feverfew, though these results have not yet been published.

"Neither the doctor nor the patient knew who was receiving the active ingredient and who the placebo," said Palevitch. "I kept the code. The results were very clear. Feverfew helped in terms of intensity and frequency. It also helped control vomiting, sensitivity to light and noise."

Feverfew is effective in three kinds of migraine — classical (preceded by blurred eyesight or flashing lights, a throbbing headache and vomiting); common migraine (an intense nauseating headache, often affecting only one side of the head); and migrainous neuralgia, usually in men (sits directly behind one eye and comes in clusters).

Some research points to its use for arthritis and pre-menstrual syndrome as well. The company says that reports have been coming in that it is also a relief for hay fever sufferers.

As early as 1985, Palevitch expressed an interest in growing the plant in Israel. "At that time it was difficult to get funding for research into medicinal herbs, but we managed to cultivate the plant successfully on a small scale."

When Brenda and Harry Smith, a retired British couple, came to his office in 1992, to talk about growing herbs in Israel, they were pleasantly surprised to discover a fellow enthusiast. Christian Zionists who had spent many summers volunteering in Kibbutz Kfar Hanassi, the Smiths decided to settle in nearby Rosh Pina in 1984 so that they could work in the kibbutz every day.

Roy Bouskila, managing director of Galilee Herbal Industries, "was looking for new business ideas for the kibbutz" and Palevitch's suggestion that they use the Volcani Institute's know-how to cultivate feverfew was, said Bouskila, "very appealing. It's not just an industrial product. There's an ideology behind it."

Using research information on sowing time and method, growing methods, harvest regime, and with the help of the Smiths, the kibbutz is now growing feverfew on 60 dunams of land.

"Our field is the largest in the world," said Bouskila.

Grown organically, the kibbutz product, called Migraleaf, has the highest percentage of parthenolide (the active ingredient) on the market. Parthenolide inhibits the production of prostaglandins that constrict the blood vessels, causing headaches. It also effects the release of serotonin (a natural tranquilizer) from human blood platelets.

Unlike most feverfew products which, according to a study in the November 1991 issue of The Journal of Natural Products, contain less than the recommended minimum 0.2 per cent of parthenolide, Migraleaf contains some .45 per cent. (Two capsules are recommended before every meal).

But no medical claim can be made on the label of a feverfew product because it is considered a food supplement.

"A purchaser can't tell the difference between feverfew products from the label," said Bouskila. "Companies are not required to indicate the percentage of active ingredient. We wish they were. Each batch of Migraleaf is chemically analyzed to ensure both 100 per cent purity and the required level of active ingredient."

Attempts to grow feverfew with the active ingredient in the United States and Mexico have been unsuccessful, and Bouskila insists that his high quality product has no competitors.

Judging by the orders that are pouring in, that would certainly seem to be the case. Four tons of powder and two million tablets of Migraleaf are on order from two large herbal firms — Herbal Laboratories in England and Nature's Sunshine in the United States; the powder is sold in bulk to a Dutch firm, and a big order has just come in from Germany.

Migraleaf is the first herbal product to be offered by Galilee Herbal Remedies, but certainly not the last. The kibbutz is also organically growing echinacea, an anti-flu herb, valerian, used as a sedative, and aloe vera, for healing burns and cuts.

Coin collecting proves a popular hobby in Israel

By CARL ALPERT

One of the most popular souvenirs purchased by tourist visitors to Israel is the commemorative coin or medal, issued from time to time by the government and devoted to some topical theme.

They are relatively inexpensive, have intrinsic value, are light in weight for air travel and make splendid gifts.

Perhaps someone gave you one of those nice shiny coins issued in 1963, devoted to seafaring in Israel. For your information, only 6,000 of them were minted, and the latest market price for the coin is many hundreds of dollars.

The collection of Israel coins has become a solid hobby. It is almost as widespread as stamp collecting and has several advantages.

For one thing, coins and medals are less fragile than stamps. Furthermore, they cover a span of history going back 2,000 years and more. To be sure, some coins are expensive, but all are a good investment.

The true collector is more interested in the history of his coins and in the completeness of his collection than in their value, but the knowledge that they increase in value from year to year adds an element of security.

When the State of Israel came into existence in 1948, more thought was given to the production of postage stamps than coins. A first coin, made of aluminum and worth 25 mils, was hastily struck in Tel Aviv. The theme was a cluster of grapes, copied from a coin which Bar Kochba had issued in the year 132 CE, at the time of his revolt against the Romans. For Israel it symbolized the rebirth of the Jewish Stage and the continuity of Jewish history.

The coin was so poorly minted that it only entered circulation when small change became scarce years later. Only 42,000 were made and each has great value today.

Some collectors go in for ancient coins. There are thousands of them floating around and thousands more yet to be found. Many tourists kick up the dust at Caesarea or Megiddo hoping to find old coins. Some do.

Besides Bar Kochba, ancient coins have historic associations with Alexsander Yannai, Titus, Alexander the Great and others.

The great stimulus to collecting came in 1958 when the government of Israel began issuing special commemorative coins. They are legal tender, but few people ever spend them. Issued in limited number, they are worth far more as collectors' items.

The coins are devoted to historical and topical themes connected with places around the country, Jewish institutions, holidays and special events.

There are coins, beautifully designed, devoted to animals or plants mentioned in the Bible.

The newest coin, which made its appearance on Israel's 45th anniversary, is dedicated to tourism, and carries a number of symbols identified with that industry, such as the sun and a boat sailing on the sea, archeological motifs and even a hotel room key. The coin comes in three denominations, with the 10-shekel coin in gold. They may be small in size, but like Israel itself, good things come in small packages.

NFL star says religion not a factor in sport

Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

San Francisco 49ers offensive tackle Harris Barton was in Israel recently to spread some good will. The seven-year vet and graduate of two Super Bowls was the guest of the Koret Foundation in conjuction with the Jewish Community Federation of San Francisco.

He toured the country together with other high profile Bay Area Jewish professionals: radio talk show host Michael Krasny, transplant surgeon Nancy Ascher and hi-tech businessman Jim Katzman.

The 6 ft. 4, 290 lb. lineman is the only Jewish player in the NFL, the significance of which he's not quite sure of. Asked if he desires one day to be recognized as the best Jewish football player ever, he was ambivalent.

"There are no athletes who are considered the best Baptists or the best Italians. No one wants to be labeled. It's a restrictive thing, a kind of stigma. People just want to be liked for who they are," said the affable 30-year-old.

"The bottom line: Get the job done and the team will have you."

Barton was a finance major at the University of North Carolina, where he graduated Phi Beta Kappa. His parents were a bit disappointed about him choosing a sports career.

Barton has no illusion about the longevity of his tenure. "It's a grind-em-up and spit-em-out profession. As soon as you lose a step, you're out. Football is a macho thing, so people play with pain and injury."

At 30, he knows his time is coming. "All of us want to go out gracefully, but we all go kicking and screaming."

Barton looks forward to a career in finance and the opportunity to tell his children that he was the guy that gave Joe Montana all that time to throw. "Joe Montana is the greatest football player I have known. Along with supreme confidence in his ability, he was a tremendous leader. He played loose. He loved to win."

In the Bay area, Barton is well known in Jewish community volunteer work. He speaks to many youngsters, to whom he stresses the importance of education. "With that under your belt, you can do anything you want."

Barton is not a Johnny-come-lately to Judaism. He spent Grades 1 to 5 in the Hebrew Academy of Atlanta and would have gone on "if I hadn't become a discipline problem."

Most of the NFL's defensive linemen doubtless wish that the four-time All Pro had been better behaved.

Shofar central to holidays

By DR. FRED WEINBERG
Special to The CJN

The Shofar is the principal symbol of the Jewish New Year, just as the seder plate is that of Passover and the lulav and etrog of Sukkot. In fact, these items long antedated the six-pointed star of David as Jewish symbols.

In ancient mosaic synagogue floors and other forms of Jewish art, one of the leading motifs is the shofar. In the Bible, Rosh Hashanah is described, not as the Jewish New Year, but as a "day of sounding the horn," and the central ceremony of the holiday in the synagogue is still the sounding of the shofar.

The shofar is fashioned from the horn of a ram because this reminds one of the sacrifice that the patriarch Abraham made in the place of Isaac. The Akedah (the Isaac sacrifice story), reflects the prohibition of human sacrifices which were prevalent in the Canaanite and other cultures of the peoples that surrounded the biblical Children of Israel.

Actually, any horn from a kosher animal, not necessarily a ram, may be used, except that of an ox or a cow which are reminders of Israel's greatest sin, that of idolatry when they built and worshipped the Golden Calf.

The shofar is not an easy instrument to blow and the baal tekiah, as the sounder of the horn is called, must be well-versed in the particular notation that he blows.

There is also a prompter, called the makri, who announces the notes to be blown. Technically it is incumbent upon the listeners to hear the actual sound of the shofar at first-hand and not its echo; nor is it to be heard through any aids such as a loudspeaker or radio — a problem for some modern synagogues.

The Mishnah describes the shofar sounds: tekiah (a long blast), shevarim (broken sounds), and teruah (a wavering, crying sound). After much controversy it was decided that the teruah should consist of nine staccato notes.

During the month of Elul the shofar is blown from the second day of the new month to usher in the season of repentance. It is sounded at morning services daily — except for the last day — throughout the month until Rosh Hashanah is over, and once more on Yom Kippur, the Day of Atonement, when it is such a welcome sound at the conclusion of the Neilah service.

When Rosh Hashanah fell on the Sabbath, the shofar was blown in the Temple of Jerusalem but not throughout the rest of Israel.

It is interesting that in the Temple the shofar was accompanied by the blast of two silver trumpets positioned one on each side of the shofar. The arrangement was such that the shofar continued after the trumpets had stopped, in order to emphasize the importance of the sound of the shofar.

The biblical commandment to blow the Shofar is dependent on a specific time, that is, during the Rosh Hashanah service, and there is a ruling that all mitzvot that are limited by time factors are not obligatory to women who have household duties.

However in the case of the shofar, over the years it has become a very seriously followed custom that women have accepted the responsibility of hearing the shofar.

In some communities, the shofar was blown for them at home, just as the Purim megillah was especially read to them at home when their household duties prevented attendance at synagogue services.

In addition to the shofar's major significance on Rosh Hashanah, in ancient times it was also the sound of a call to battle. In 1967, at the end of the Six Day War, when the Kotel (the Western Wall of the ancient temple in Jerusalem) was reclaimed, the shofar was sounded there.

Cultural anthropologists ascribe to the shofar earlier magical folk beliefs. The shofar, they feel, was used to frighten away Satan and evil spirits, and indeed in the Talmud this is mentioned. A black shofar is used in the rare ceremony of excommunication of an individual who has seriously sinned against the Jewish community.

Of course, as is the case for many early customs, Jewish philosophers refined those practices and removed their more primitive associations.

Maimonides perhaps interprets the shofar sounds to us in an acceptable, modern manner when he says:

"Awake ye sleepers from your sleep, o slumberers arouse ye from your slumbers, and examine your deeds, return in repentance and remember your Creator." We can all bear this in mind this Rosh Hashanah.

Indian Jews help cricket thrive in Israel

Jerusalem Dateline

Cricket is not often associated with Israel, but the game thrives in the country, thanks in large part to the contribution of Indian Jewry.

The Indian domination of local cricket can be gauged from the fact that the Israeli domestic league has 14 teams, of which 12 have a majority of players of Indian origin. The remaining cricketers come largely from other English-speaking countries: Great Britain, South Africa, and Australia.

The southern port city of Ashdod, with its large Indian Jewish community, is the centre of Israeli cricket. The city has five teams and three grounds.

Noah Davidson, who hails from Bombay, is the secretary of the Israeli Cricket Association and a former professional cricketer with Central Railways in Bombay.

"When I immigrated to Israel in 1969," recounts Davidson, "I made extensive enquiries about the possibility of playing cricket in the country. If there had been no cricket, I would have been depressed, to say the least."

Another former Bombayan, Harry Jonathan, settled in Ashdod in the 1950s and laid the foundation for what would become the Israel Cricket Association. Yet another immigrant from Bombay, Ezra Ashtankar, is currently chair of the Israel Cricket Association.

Under Ashtankar's shrewd leadership, Israel has developed from an outpost of cricket into an integrated member of the international cricketing community. The country competes in the World Cup, though it has yet to make any impact on the international scene.

Ashtankar recently traveled back to India with Davidson, following the opening of full diplomatic relations between Israel and India.

They met with their cricketing counterparts there and agreed that groups of young Israeli cricketers should be sent to coaching camps in India each year. Through such coaching camps, Israel hopes to elevate its cricketing standards.

Water exercises help women

Jerusalem Dateline

Exercising in water increases bone mass in middle-aged women more effectively than conventional exercises on dry land, say a group of researchers at the Hebrew University of Jerusalem.

In what they believe is the first clinically controlled study of water-exercise on osteoporosis, the team found significant gain in bone mass in women doing water exercises, compared with a parallel group who worked out in a gym.

"It seemed to me that the safety and ease of movement offered by exercise under water makes it more attractive to middle-aged and elderly women, especially those in pain or with other limiting physical conditions," says Esther Goldstein, a teacher at Israel's Wingate Institute of Physical Education in Netanya.

Goldstein carried out the study at the Braun-Hebrew University-Hadassah School of Public Health and Community Medicine in Jerusalem.

Common wisdom had long rejected water-exercise as a way of building up bone mass. Experts believed that the gravitational pull (or weight-bearing) of conventional exercise was an essential element in bone-building.

To prove their point, Goldstein and her supervisors — Profs. Leon Epstein, Hillel Ruskin and Ariel Simkin — recruited 50 post-menopausal women through the Hadassah Medical Centre and divided them into matched groups.

Each group of volunteers exercised for three 45-minute sessions a week, one doing water-resistance exercises in a swimming pool, the other working out in a gym. Five months later, the water-group had made demonstrable gains in bone-mass, compared with the gym group, who showed little increase.

Exercise programs are one of the main ways of counteracting the effects of osteoporosis. Painful, disfiguring and disabling, the disease is a growing public-health menace, afflicting one in every four women over 60 in the western world, and many men and younger women as well. In the United States alone, some 24 million people are affected, suffering 1,300,000 fractures each year and costing an annual $7-$10 billion.

Although doctors know what osteoprosis is and who is at highest risk, the disease still holds many secrets. There is, for example, no general medical agreement on what triggers it, what can prevent it or how it should be treated.

The development of osteoporosis (literally, "porous bones"), however, is known to depend on two factors: how much bone-mass there is to begin with, and how fast it diminishes with aging, particularly after menopause. Further, it has been proven that exercise both relieves pain and even helps regain some bone mass.

Goldstein suggests that water-resistance exercise can help prevent osteoporosis as well as offset its effects.

"It would be particularly useful for people with injuries, chronic illness or brittle bone conditions who can't do conventional exercise," she says. "The gentler medium of water will allow them to develop strength more gradually, with less pain and less risk of new injury."

In the centre of this vault painting stands a female figure, who may represent Ceres, the goddess of grain and vegetation. She was the central character in the Eleusinian Mysteries, which celebrated the endless cycle of death and rebirth of both plants and mankind. Interestingly, this pagan motif associated with life after death appears in a Jewish catacomb. From the photo documentary exhibition "VAULTS OF MEMORY, Jewish and Christian Imagery in the Catacombs of Rome" on loan from the International Catacomb Society, Boston, Massachusetts, which was on display at the Bible Lands Museum until August 30, 1994.

Vatican exhibit to be shown in Jerusalem

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

Following the establishment of full diplomatic ties between the Vatican and Israel, plans are being finalized to bring the Vatican's exhibit on The Jewish Presence in Ancient Rome to the Bible Lands Museum Jerusalem later this year.

The Israel exhibition will be the first outside the Vatican.

"This exhibition is of major significance to all of world Jewry," said museum director and founder Batya Borowski.

The Bible Lands Museum Jerusalem already houses an outstanding collection of more than 2,000 Bible-related artifacts, gifts from founders and former Torontonians Dr. Elie and Batya Borowski.

The Jewish Presence in Ancient Rome goes back to the days when Jews first settled in the imperial city around 100 BCE. The community quickly grew to 50,000.

At that time, the Jews could practice their religion virtually undisturbed. They enjoyed imperial protection from the time of Julius Caesar and Augustus, and their rights were protected under Roman law. The modern Jewish community of Rome is one of the oldest in the world, part of a continuous Jewish presence of more than 2,000 years.

The Jews of ancient Rome were among the best-known Jewish communities of antiquity. We know about them from the three Jewish catacombs of Rome — Monteverde, Via Appia and Via Montana. These sites have furnished more than 500 inscriptions of the dead and the congregations to which they belonged. From that information historians have sketched an outline of the Jewish community's religious life and customs.

"We will focus on the period during which this community flourished, from the late second century BCE to the fourth century CE," Elie Borowski said.

The exhibit has been approved by the Italian Embassy and the Italian Cultural Institute in Israel. The Cultural Department of Foreign Affairs in Israel has expressed its support for this endeavor.

Among the objects to be displayed are portrait sculptures, ceramic lamps, gold cups, seals, sarcophagi, rings, and column capitals.

The exhibit will cover three areas: the Jewish Community of Rome; the Jews and the Caesars; and Roman and Judean Jews.

Within the ancient community — its synagogues, its organizations, its religious life and communal activities — Jews also functioned as ordinary citizens of Rome. Names were Latin rather than Greek or Semitic. Some Jews Latinized or Hellenized their Hebrew names: Zosimos for Chaym, Theodotus for Jonathan, Justus for Zadik, Donatus for Nathan, Aster for Esther — a practise common amongst Diaspora Jews everywhere.

High Holiday theme of repentance requires preparation, reflection

By RABBI AARON LEVINE

The theme of the High Holidays, actually beginning with the first day of the month of Elul and culminating with the awesome day of Yom Kippur, is teshuvah, repentance. Repentance requires introspection, and introspection requires preparation and reflection.

We can't leave our businesses a little earlier on Erev Rosh Hashanah, take showers, go to the mikvah, put on our new suits, go to shul, and say — "We're ready for the New Year."

What we really should do, is sit down a long time before Rosh Hashanah, take out a little notebook and pencil, and start some serious thinking and planning about our New Year's resolutions. If we haven't done that already, we should realize that time is marching relentlessly on, and we shouldn't delay the process any longer.

I'm sure we all have good intentions. We want to repent. We want to resolve to do better. But if we don't take the task at hand seriously, honestly and earnestly, we can wind up like the woman in the following famous parable:

A poor country woman had no food to give her many children. One day she found an egg and excitedly told her children that their worries for food were over.

"I shall take this egg and ask the neighbors if we can put it under their hen until a chick is hatched. We won't eat the chick, but we'll set her on other eggs until they, too, hatch into chickens. They, in turn, will lay more eggs, and we'll hatch them into chickens as well. Then we'll sell some of the chickens and buy a cow and raise the cow until she bears calves. Then we'll sell some of the calves and buy a field. Then we'll have a field in which we can plant all sorts of food, and cows and milk and chickens and eggs, and we won't need anything more."

As she was speaking and playing with the egg, it fell out of her hands and broke, shattering all of her dreams and hopes for food.

Elaborate schemes

Says Rabbi Chaim of Sanz: Each of us resembles the lady in the story. When the days of repentance arrive, we resolve to do this and to do that and make elaborate schemes to rectify so many things.

Yet the days slip by out of our hands, minds, and hearts, and thought does not lead to the actions we had planned, so we remain unchanged as before. Therefore we must take every precaution to ensure that our resolutions of repentance come to fruition.

But what bothers most of us, I'm sure, who take seriously the task of making new resolutions, is the following. We probably all say to ourselves, "I made resolutions last year, and the year before, and the year before that, and I stuck to them during the High Holidays and maybe even for awhile after that. But soon it was back to my old ways as usual. What's the use of all the resolutions if they fizzle out after awhile?"

That reminds me of another famous parable:

One day the son of a king seemingly lost his mind. He went around town flapping his arms like a rooster crowing cocka-doodle-doo. The king, understandably, was very upset and concerned about his son. He called in his advisors and doctors but none could do anything for the deranged prince. The king promised a large reward for the man who could bring his son back to his senses.

One day a stranger, who happened to be visiting the town, heard about the situation. He came to the king and told him not to worry. He knew how to cure his son.

The man went to visit the prince and when he saw him, he too flapped his wings and started cocka-doodle-dooing like the deranged prince. The prince warmed up to his fellow "rooster" and became friendly with the stranger.

"Listen," said the man to the prince. "It's soon going to be Yom Kippur. You know what they do to roosters like us on Erev Yom Kippur. They're going to slaughter us for kaporos. I think it would be advisable that we stop acting like roosters. No more wing flapping and no more cocka-doodle-dooing."

"You know, you're right," said the prince. "I never thought of that. I'll stop immediately."

Next day, the prince was back to normal. The king was delighted and handsomely rewarded the stranger who left town with his bounty, never to be heard from again.

Everything was going along well. The prince no longer acted like a rooster and everyone thought that he had been cured. Erev Yom Kippur came and went. Yom Kippur came and went. And the next morning the prince was once again prancing around town, flapping his arms and cocka-doodle-dooing. Now that the danger had passed, the kaporos were done with, he could revert to being a rooster once again.

Says one of the great Jewish preachers: We resemble the deranged prince. A whole year we go around sinning, not acting the way we should. We strut around like roosters, flapping our wings, crowing all sorts of nonsense. But when the Yomim, Noraim, the High Holiday season comes, we become a little nervous.

After all, the Almighty will begin judging Mankind: Who will live, and who shall die; who will be well, and who sick; who rich and who poor?

We better come back to our senses and stop acting deranged. So we behave for awhile and put on a good show for a few weeks or days until the danger passes. Yom Kippur passes, and it's back to business as usual. Resolutions are tossed out the window. The cycle of sinning begins again. Back to being roosters!

So what is the answer? Surely we cannot make fools of ourselves and stand before Hashem on Rosh Hashanah and Yom Kippur promising to be better and then make a mockery of our committments.

My revered rebbe, Rabbi Dovid Kronglass, used to always tell us two things before Rosh Hashanah.

One: Don't make impossible resolutions. Tell the Almighty, for example, "I know speaking loshen hora, (gossip and evil talk about another), even one word of it, is evil. I wish I wouldn't speak it at all. But to promise You that I won't speak a word next year is not realistic. But I do promise You, Hashem, that I will definitely make inroads against this sin. I will minimize the extent of the loshen hora that I have been talking. I will make every effort to control myself at certain times, with certain people, on certain topics."

Firmly resolving to minimize the sin — that's a realistic goal. Doing teshuvah is a lifelong process. If each year we gain a little territory against the battle with the yetzer hora, then we're making progress. We are not making a mockery out of our resolutions.

Second: Instead of making dozens of smaller resolutions that can each be broken during the year quite easily, make one firm sweeping resolution that will automatically encompass many others. For example, resolve to study Torah and Halachah with a genuinely observant Rabbi or teacher, for just one hour a week. That's not such a difficult resolution to keep. One hour a week. That's a realistic goal. But that one hour a week will change your lives. You'll come closer to Hashem and His Torah. You'll automatically improve in scores of other areas as well.

Each individual has to adapt the concepts to his or her situation. It is not a hopeless cause. We can successfully do teshuvah. That's really what Rosh Hashanah and Yom Kippur are all about.

Good luck! Kesivah VaChasimah Tovah.

O.J. case reveals Jewish violence

By PAMELA DRUCKERMAN
Jewish Telegraphic Service

The thought of a Jewish man battering his wife often strikes the same cognitive dissonance as the idea of football hero O. J. Simpson standing trial for the murder of his ex-wife.

But in the wake of the much-publicized Simpson case, the volume of calls to shelters and domestic violence agencies catering to Jewish women has jumped, reflecting what experts say is the oft-denied truth that Jews are victims of domestic violence as often as the population at large.

The Family Violence Prevention Centre in New York City has had 25 per cent more calls to its hotline since the Simpson case started making headlines in mid-June, according to a spokesperson.

And the Family Violence Project of Los Angeles, part of the local Jewish Family Service, has seen the number of new calls for services nearly double, said director Lynn Moriarty.

"Something as startling as this breaks through a lot of denial," said Moriarty.

Despite ongoing efforts by communal agencies and religious movements to educate Jewish communities about the problem, experts say the perception that Jewish homes are untouched by domestic violence persists.

"This has been the best-kept secret in the whole community for many years," Moriarty said.

Experts who work with abused women from a range of ethnic backgrounds say the patterns of intimidation, abuse and reconciliation in abusive relationships, and the need for control which drives the abuser, easily cross cultural lines.

What is different for a Jewish woman is that the social forces within the Jewish community affect when, and whether, she and her family receive help.

Directors of shelters and social service programs around the country say that Judaism's emphasis on family, and the notions of a "nice Jewish husband" and a "happy Jewish home" often lead battered women to hide or deny the abuse.

"The Jewish community is mired in collective denial. We just don't want to admit this in our community," Moriarty said.

The fear of failing to live up to these ideals, experts say, makes it more difficult for Jewish women to recognize they are being abused and less likely that they will seek help.

Fear of failure

"In a community that believes this doesn't happen in our community," said Susan Hirschstein, director of residential services for the Nassau County Coalition Against Domestic Violence in New York State, "it's even harder for someone to come out and say, 'Yes, it does.' "

Spousal abuse occurs in 10 to 20 per cent of Jewish households, according to a 1983 study published in the Journal of Jewish Community Service. Social workers and others who work with battered Jewish women say the rate leans more toward 20 per cent, consistent with the national average.

The study also showed that unlike the population at large, Jewish women in higher socio-economic brackets may be more likely to be abused than poorer ones, although abuse does cross economic and denominational lines.

Workers at shelters said it is not uncommon to have young Jewish professionals arrive at a shelter with nothing but their children and the clothes they are wearing.

Because abusive spouses often maintain complete control over the family finances, many women lack the financial resources to flee, or fear a drastic drop in material lifestyle if they do.

There is also great fear among Jews of threatening the family's social position, or of simply not being believed because of a spouse's prominence in the community.

In many cases, experts say, a woman's stories of abuse are not believed or she herself is blamed for "disrupting" the community or home.

Others hide abuse from their doctors and therapists.

Social, financial isolation

Hirschstein said it is common for batterers to claim their wives deserved to be beaten.

"Women often say, 'He said to me if I'd only had dinner ready at 6 when he walked in'," said Hirschstein.

The demoralization, as well as social and financial isolation, and the hope that things will somehow get better, is what often keeps battered women from simply running away, experts say.

While some look to the Jewish community for support services, others go to programs outside the community for fear of exposing their spouses — or themselves — to embarrassment.

According to Janet Geller, director of the Family Violence Prevention Centre in New York, even when Jewish women are involved in social programs they resist group therapy, out of fear — the women say — of running into someone they know.

Rabbis can sometimes be complicit in this denial, dismissing women's complaints or counselling them to return home and try to make things better.

"With rabbis, it's a hit-or-miss," said Rabbi Julie Ringold Spitzer, author of Spousal Abuse in Rabbinical and Contemporary Judaism. She said the chances of getting a responsive rabbi does not vary among the demominations.

Many service organizations and shelters grew out of grassroots efforts begun in the 1970s and '80s by Jewish activists — nearly all of them women — trying to put domestic violence on the Jewish communal agenda.

High on the priority of these groups has been teaching Jewish educators and religious and lay leaders, who are often first to be contacted in domestic abuse cases, how to recognize and handle the problem.

The Reform and Conservative movement have dealt with the issue of domestic violence, offering training workshops for rabbis, and publishing resource materials. And the Orthodox community has grown increasingly responsive to the issue in recent years.

There are now shelters in several cities catering exclusively to Orthodox women, who fear a loss of stature in their close-knit communities if their abuse is known.

But activists in the field say that while there has been a greater willingness to confront the issue in recent years, denial remains strong.

Some say the publicity surrounding the O. J. Simpson case has empowered battered women, letting them know that they are not alone and that there are ways of seeking help.

Others say the publicity has actually inhibited some women from seeking help.

"Women say: I'm not going to leave now. Look what happens when you leave," said Hirschstein, who explained it is common for abusers to leave newspaper articles describing violent acts around the house as a warning to their wives.

Moriarty in Los Angeles said she has heard from women whose husbands have threatened to "O. J." them.

Former Vancouverite Kalman Samuels receives the Humanity Award from Israel President Ezer Weizman (left).

Vancouver couple helps handicapped Israeli kids

By MAURICE LUCOW
CJN Western Correspondent

A former Vancouver man and his wife were honored recently by the president of Israel, Ezer Weizman, for "their magnificent endeavors for humanity, accomplished with love for humanity in a pleasant and modest manner."

Kalman and Malka Samuels, the parents of six children, operate the Shalva Centre-Israel Association to Relieve the Handicapped Child and Family, in Jerusalem.

Shalva provides an activity centre for special-needs children during the afternoon and evening, giving parents some relief from the continual stress of caring for their disabled children. (Shalva is an acronym for the Hebrew phrase "peace of mind.")

In June, Kalman Samuels attended a fundraiser in Vancouver, at the home of Les and Tracy Ames. Shalva's operating budget is $450,000 per year, and substantial funding is provided by the prominent Vancouver Diamond family through the Diamond Foundation.

The Israel President's Citation for Community Service was established 20 years ago by the then-president, Ephraim Katzir. Twelve awards were made this year by President Weizman.

Samuels was born and raised in Vancouver; he told The CJN he was "a regular, traditional Vancouver Jewish kid."

He said he had no special goal in life after graduation from the University of British Columbia (UBC) and decided to go to Europe for four months to study western civilization. The trip took him to Israel, where friends urged him to study his own roots and civilization. He was 19.

He attended a number of yeshivot and decided Israel was where he wanted to live.

He learned Yiddish as well as Hebrew and was admitted to study at "a real old-time yeshivah" in B'nai Brak.

In 1973 he married Malka, a Yugoslavian-born American who had also made aliyah.

The Samuels' second child, Yosef, became deaf and blind at the age of 11 months, as the result of a reaction to a vaccination.

The family moved to New York, where Kalman Samuels' uncle was a surgeon, looking for medical help for their son. They refused to put him in an institution but did enrol him in New York's Light House for the Blind; he was home every day by noon, when Malka took over the responsibility of caring for him.

Although Samuels had been ordained as a rabbi in Israel, he worked in the computer field in New York. But he said it was difficult looking after a young family with a handicapped child, and after four and a half years in New York, they moved back to Israel where Malka "kept noodging me to do something to help other children and, at the same time, provide some relief for the parents."

In 1990, Samuels came to Vancouver to see his father who was ill. He told an old friend, Gordon Diamond, about an idea he and Malka had. Diamond was interested and said the family foundation would offer capital for a facility in Jerusalem if the Samuels would run it.

"We look after 80 severely handicapped children a year in a rented facility. We're hoping to buy our own building," said Samuels.

The programming for younger children runs from 1:30 to 6 p.m. Children from all over Jerusalem are bussed to Shalva in the Har Nof neighborhood, and the daily social and educational programs are geared to each individual child, according to ability. The program is under the supervision of professional special education staff.

"At Shalva the kids don't have to sit in a corner by themselves — they mix freely and build up their confidence."

From 6 to 8:30 p.m., older children, mainly from sheltered workshops, come to the Shalva Centre. These young people rarely have a social life of their own and "we provide them with activities."

There is also a program for sleeping over — about 10 children a night. Camping is offered in July and August to about 25 to 30 children with disabilities at a time.

"Meanwhile," said Samuels, "the parents suddenly have a window on the world. They are given a brief respite from the day-to-day chores and worries of looking after their children."

What's important is that Shalva's services are offered free. "There are no mandatory fees, although we do accept contributions," he said.

In making the presentation to the Samuels, President Weizman said, "Through the power of their faith and dedication to their goals, [they have] succeeded in attracting scores of volunteers, both young and old, who assist in the major task of operating this unique environment, offering emotional support and assistance for parents during most trying times."

The Samuels' mitzvah has helped them with their own problems.

"Through a miracle," said Samuels, "there was a breakthrough for our son Yosef." Samuels taught him to understand by holding his hand to form letters of the alphabet and Yosef quickly picked up the idea of what was wanted of him. "Then he began to speak!"

Yosef has celebrated his bar mitzvah, attends camp, has friends in the neighborhood and rides a bike; his mother lets him go for a pizza once a week. He attends a full-day program at the Jerusalem Institute for the Blind.

Samuels, 42, used to play a great game of basketball in Vancouver but now he only gets out on the court in Jerusalem once a week — usually on Tuesday nights. He spends most of his time in administration of Shalva and in raising funds. There is no financial assistance from the government.

He has contacts in Europe and the United States, as well as in Canada. He has set up the Canadian Friends of Shalva at 2095 W. 45th Ave., Vancouver, B.C., V6M 2H8.

The Canadian organization has a tax number and can give receipts for contributions. Head office is at PO Box 35199, Jerusalem, 91351; fax 972-2-250736.

Israel's top concerns in the coming year

By CARL ALPERT
Special to The CJN

The Yom Kippur period is conducive to contemplation, and in accordance with our annual custom at this time of year, we offer our list of the dozen major problems which Israel will be called upon to face in the 12 months ahead. Many of these items appear on the list every year, perhaps sometimes changing place in order of importance.

Modus vivendi with Gaza-Jericho: There will be many problems to solve and misunderstandings to iron out, but the true test of the peace process (and it is still only a process) lies in the ability of both sides to adjust to a relationship which is new to both, and still subject to opposition on both sides.

Relations with Syria: Despite fumbling gestures toward seeking common ground on which to conduct talks, sober and realistic Israelis are aware of the ever-present threat of armed conflict with our neighbor to the north and east, who continues to stack his arsenal with tanks, planes and missiles. Israel Defence Forces are constantly on the alert.

Negotiations on Stage Two: Gaza and Jericho first, what next? Talks will be held, preliminary documents drawn up, letters exchanged, some open and some secret, opposition and encouragement will alternate, as this Israel government so long as it remains in power will continue to explore the next steps in the peace process.

Government Stability: All foreign relations policies, not to speak of domestic problems, will depend on the ability of the Rabin government to maintain its shaky control of the Knesset, and hold on to power through to the next scheduled elections in 1996.

Relations with Jordan: Now that the de facto thaw in our relations with Jordan has become official, there are factors external to the two parties which will seek to sabotage the move towards true neighborly relations.

Terrorism: This must be expected both from the Hamas in the south and from the Hezbollah in the north, together with mounting fear of extremist nationalist expressions from Arab Israelis within the borders.

The Economic Situation: The economy is basically sound, with excellent prospects for the future, if confidence can be maintained and inflation controlled.

National Health System: The near collapse of the Kupat Holim Clalit of the Histadrut, and the reform of the national health insurance generally, will necessitate continued drastic overhaul of the system.

Immigration: The lag in arrival of newcomers from Eastern Europe will provide a necessary breathing spell in the process of absorption and integration, together with an opportunity to take stock of how to improve the process.

Internal Extremism: Political, religious and secular movements which seek to advance their causes by resorting to vocal intemperance, too often proceed from there to vehement passion and excitable physical violence. It is a tendency which does not bode well for Israel.

The Traffic Explosion: Acquisition of new cars continues by far to outpace provision of adequate roads or parking spaces. Plans for urban public rapid transit and for super highways give little indication that they will provide the solutions necessary.

Water Supply: This is another perennial problem. A growing population, together with increased industrial and agricultural consumption, cause warning alarms to be sounded, especially as no new water sources are available. To the contrary, important present sources are endangered, with talk of Palestinian control of the West Bank, and possible withdrawal from the Golan.

These, then, are the 12 major problems which Israel will be called upon to face in the coming year. When we reach Yom Kippur next year, how many of these will be closer to solution?

Protecting animals

Israel's pioneering efforts to eliminate cruelty to animals leaped two steps forward this summer when the government initiated a new law enforcement policy and a program of humane education in the school system.

Government officials informed Concern for Helping Animals in Israel (CHAI), a non-profit organization, of the changes. CHAI has won official recognition and support for its innovative efforts to improve the condition of Israel's animals since its establishment in 1984.

Chief of Police Haim Hefets announced that he has instructed all police stations in the country to investigate seriously all reported cases of cruelty to animals.

In addition, in the Knesset, the interior and environment committee issued a recommendation to the Ministry of Education stipulating that school children should spend at least one hour a week in class addressing the issue of cruelty to animals and how to prevent it.

Both these developments resulted from public sensitization to the link between abuse of animals and violence toward human beings.

That link was the subject of a conference in Tel Aviv last spring, attended by over 400 teachers, school counsellors, psychologists and criminologists.

The conference, entitled Preventing Violence in Society Through Education, was initiated by CHAI and co-sponsored with the Israel Ministry of Education.

Speakers at the conference — psychiatrists, psychololgists and educators from the United States, England, and Israel — reviewed the results of the approximately 140 published studies and articles that clearly indicate that a large percentage of violent criminals began by abusing animals when they were young.

Unchecked, they went on to commit violence against humans. Studies also show that children who abuse animals are often themselves the victims of abuse.

Among the studies discussed was one conducted in New Jersey which revealed that in 88 per cent of families receiving treatment for child abuse, animals in the home had also been abused.

In a British study, children were found to be at risk of abuse or neglect in 83 per cent of families with a history of animal abuse.

The studies showed that a large percentage of incarcerated rapists, child molesters, and sexual homicide perpetrators had abused animals during their adolescence. As a result of these findings, psychiatrists now include animal abuse as an indicator of severe conduct disorder, along with physical assault and arson.

The speakers also noted that these findings have led to the establishment of cross-reporting systems in California, Florida, Washington, and Illinois between animal protection and child protection authorities.

Under these systems, for example, if a child were found living in a home where animal abuse had occurred, the case would automatically be referred to child protection authorities for further investigation.

At the conclusion of the conference CHAI announced that it is preparing a seminar on the child/animal abuse link that will become part of teachers' and counsellors' continuing education in Israel.

CHAI is also preparing a humane education curriculum for Israeli schools, since humane education has been shown to develop more positive attitudes in children toward humans as well as toward animals.

For more information, CHAI can be reached at POB 3341, Alexandria, VA, 22302.

Berry picking could have been our death

This is another in a series of Holocaust memories by Toronto resident Judith Rubinstein.

When we enjoy the last of summer's bounty let us think back to five teenagers for whom a simple berry-picking expedition could have been a death sentence.

Let us also remember the astounding unselfishness that could still be found in those darkest of dark times.

By JUDITH RUBINSTEIN
Special to The CJN

The year was 1944 — late fall. I was doing forced labor in Auschwitz Concentration Camp.

Twenty of us young girls belonged to a commando team required to clean the watch towers around the crematorium. Five girls were assigned to each tower.

On quiet days, when the activities in the crematorium were slowed down, we dared to leave the towers after finishing our jobs to pick blackberries on the edge of what was called the Forbidden Forest. If we were lucky enough to pick a dish full of berries and to smuggle it back into the camp, we could then sell it for a loaf of bread. At the time, a loaf of bread was considered the ultimate luxury.

As we emerged from the forest one day, the commandant from the crematorium noticed us and ordered us to hand our berries over to him. Before we had a chance to think about the terrible situation we were in, a soldier was behind us ordering us back to the camp site. Confused and frightened, we marched in.

On arrival, we stood in the square for a long time. In the meantime, the Germans gathered all the information about us. The verdict was that we had wanted to run away and the punishment for that crime was public hanging. Even the date was decided upon, the next morning at 10 a.m. Usually the entire camp population was forced to watch the horrible consequences for those who tried to escape.

Of the five of us, two had sisters who were not involved in this terrible situation. They became hysterical and started to run around asking for advice to see if anything could be done. Nobody had an answer. Since there was no trial, there could be no defence presented; the Germans did as they pleased.

Late that night, one of our supervisors advised us to go over to the next compound and seek help from a woman named Ethel who had the reputation of being a very good soul. Although she had been there a very long time, she hadn't lost her compassion and sympathy for the less fortunate. She was responsible for a thousand women and she tried to be humane.

When we arrived, she had just lit the sabbath candle in her little cubicle; she had heard about our misfortune and gently told us what we already knew — there was no way out of this terrible situation. She prayed with us and blessed us and wished us a peaceful journey.

Numb in body and soul, we walked back to our sleeping quarters. That night was the longest in my life. Early in the morning, a young girl arrived with a message from Ethel. She had found a connection to the commandant who handled our case; for five gold watches our lives could be spared. The watches were found in no time and the sentence was terminated with the warning that we should never dare to visit the forest again.

Later we found out that our German leader, an elderly man who smuggled liquor out to the workers in the crematorium in return for gold, diamonds and other valuables (every evening he carried a bulging attache case), thought they might ask him where he was while he allowed us to wander around. He pulled a few strings in order to save himself. A few weeks later we were shipped out to Germany where we worked until liberation the next spring.

I never heard of Ethel again. I didn't even know what her family name was or where she came from.

Ten years ago, a good friend of mine returned from Israel with a story that a friend from her hometown had become a grandmother of quintuplets. The family was very poor and it was difficult to raise five babies; they also had a year-old baby. My heart went out to them. I started to send money and parcels to this family. Every time I would receive a thank you note from the grandmother.

Only on the fifth birthday of the children did I find out that the grandmother was none other than Ethel who saved us girls from the gallows.

Unfortunately by that time she was dead. I never had an opportunity to say thank you for the gift of life.

May her memory be blessed among the righteous men and women who attempted to ease the pain at the difficult time in history.

CEREMONIAL POMEGRANATE

This rare carved pomegranate was discovered by Israeli archeologists near Jerusalem. Eight centimetres long, it is made of "Egyptian Blue," an artificial substance used for painting and molding valuable objects in ancient times.

It is thought to have been either placed at the tip of a sceptre, or used as a decoration for a horse's bridle. [Israel Antiquities Authority photo]

Seafaring tale relates the last voyage of the Paducah

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to The CJN

A recent ceremony at the U.S. Holocaust Museum paid tribute to the captain and crew of the Paducah, an aging American gunship sold as surplus and retrofitted to smuggle Holocaust survivors through the British blockade to Palestine in 1947.

The captain of the Paducah was Rudolph Patzert, a 35-year-old New York City gentile who agreed to sail the ship from Brooklyn to Bulgaria. He did not suspect the true mission. But by the time members of the Haganah underground asked him to continue to Palestine with a cargo of some 1,500 Jewish refugees to be picked up in Bulgaria, they had rightly sized him up as someone who would not walk away from such a humanitarian endeavour. Patzert, who was given special honours at the Holocaust Museum ceremony, now lives in retirement with his wife in Encinatas, Calif.

Torontonian Morry Lewis was a helmsman on the Paducah's sister ship, the Northland, which was renamed the Jewish State enroute to Palestine. "We were two ships that ran together," he recalls. "We were both outfitted for refugees in Bayonne, France, from the inside out.

The Paducah steams past Gibralter. This photograph was apparently taken by British intelligence.

"The United Nations voted for a Jewish state because of the pressure we brought to bear — all those ships crammed with people trying to get in to Palestine ...These ships played a big role in the vote for getting a Jewish state."

Reuben Red Shiff, a Torontonian, was a crew member of the Paducah. Before the war, he lived with his family on Kensington Avenue, and joined the Canadian Army at 15. After serving on the Paducah, he reached the Jewish homeland and joined the incipient Israeli army. He was killed in the 1948 War of Independence.

Patzert's gripping account of the sailing of the Paducah has just been published in a book that this reviewer found hard to put down. Running the Palestine Blockade: The Last Voyage of the Paducah (Naval Institute Press, $25 US) is a fine seafaring tale in the best maritime tradition. It is also a taut drama, filled with suspense and adventure and a crowning sense of morality.

British agents and spy ships trailed the ship through the Mediterranean. After another British dirty trick in Bayonne, he worte "another door had been slammed shut against us. It seemed to me that I was discovering what it meant to be a Jew. Now I, too, was a Jew, and the Paducah herself bore a curse, and we were driven from one closed door to confront another closed door. Well, if that was the way it was, by God, we would pound and pound on the closed doors until we crashed them open."

When the Paducah's sister ship, the Northland, takes on a group of small Jewish orphans, Patzert is gripped by the overwhelming pathos of the fragile youngsters, wrapped in layers of rags, shuffling up the gangway. "The men of the Northland picked up the smallest of them and carried them into the ship tenderly, as though these were their own small sons and daughters, their own flesh.

"I'm not a sentimental man — at least, I like to think that I'm not — and I couldn't remember when I had last wept, but there were tears in my eyes now. I was not ashamed of them when Eddie Kaplansky found me in the darkness and stood beside me. These are the orphans, he said simply. There are so many of them, so very many."

Later, Patzert is moved again when he stands on the deck of the Paducah as it fills with a mass of humanity bearing a burden too heavy to carry and looking for nothing at all in the world but a home. He hears this tired, forlorn mass join together in singing Hatikvah as the ship pulls away.

Twenty-five miles off the coast of Palestine, the weary passengers sighted the Promised Land for the first time — the top of Mount Carmel, near Haifa — but would be forbidden, like Moses, from reaching it. Ten miles from shore, the Paducah was rammed by a British destroyer and its occupants captured and shipped to a refugee camp on Cyprus. To avoid a British noose for his role as captain of an illegal refugee ship, Patzert completed his ceremonial induction into the Jewish people, taking the identity of a Romanian Jew, Mendel Levey, and becoming a Jewish prisoner on Cyprus.

A woman at the Nazareth Day Care Centre for the elderly puts the finishing touches on a painting.

Day care centre helps elderly Arabs

Pirah, aged 80, who is confined to a wheelchair, arrives at the Nazareth Day Care Centre for the elderly at 8 a.m. "I feel twenty years younger," she says with a smile. After being homebound for years, she has found that she has a special talent for painting.

Pirah is just one of the more than 300 frail and physically disabled elderly who are being served by the centre. Azmi Ajamel, coordinator of services for the elderly in the Arab Sector for ESHEL, the Association for the Planning and Development of Services for the Aged in Israel, says, "We are bursting at the seams and are using every inch of space to accommodate those who come to the centre."

The centre reflects a growing trend among Israeli Arab women, more of whom now have outside employment and are not available to care for their extended family. It is a relief for a working Arab woman to know that her elderly parents will be well cared for. As Arab cultural norms change, the demand has increased to build more centres to meet emerging needs.

The centre, which was dedicated recently with the participation of Ora Namir, the minister of labor and social affairs, was established by the American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee (JDC) working through its subsidiary ESHEL, the National Insurance Institute, the Nazareth Municipality and the Ministry of Labor and Social Affairs. The centre is part of the broader effort of ESHEL to develop services for the aged in the Arab sector.

The centre is the first in the country at which Christian and Muslim Arab senior citizens share a common facility. It serves the mentally frail and physically disabled elderly and their families, providing personal, paramedical and social services. There are also outreach services to those who cannot leave their homes.

Independent elderly people in the community participate as volunteers at the centre. Hilma, age 74, gets great satisfaction from helping out. She lives alone, but says, "Here, I'm never lonely. I really enjoy helping my new friends at the centre."

JDC-ESHEL in partnership with the Ministry of Labor and Social Affairs, plans to open another day care centre for the elderly in Shfaram, the second largest city in the Arab sector.

Epstein's book a delight for kids

By LEILA SPEISMAN
CJN Staff Reporter

Good books for children that deal with holidays in an enjoyable way are rare indeed. How the Rosh Hashanah Challah Became Round, by Sylvia Epstein, illustrated by Hagit Migron (Gefen Publishing House, 1993) is such a book.

Joseph Mordechai (Yossi) is the oldest child in his family. He lords it over his brothers and sisters, because he is the only one big enough to help their father in his bakery.

Yossi and his father are very busy preparing challahs for Rosh Hashanah. Yossi is so excited about the important work he is doing, that when his father asks him to take a tray of challah dough to be baked, he — and the challahs — fall down the stairs.

It takes the rabbi and rebbetzen to get a spiritual meaning out of the accident — that just as a round challah has no end, so the community's happiness will have no end.

The illustrations are simple yet effective, using attractive pastel colours. They are also done with humor. I especially liked the one of Yossi falling down the steps, where the challahs change shape from twisted to round on their way down.

This is a delightful book for primary age children. It is also sweet and funny enough so parents will enjoy reading it to them.

Conference aims to save Ladino

World Zionist Press Service

As Turkish singer and actor Izzet Bana broke into song at the Beit Hatefutsoth Museum of the Jewish Diaspora's auditorium in Ramat Aviv, most of the 1,000 people present sang along in Judeo-Spanish (or Ladino — the language of the Jews of Spain before their expulsion in 1492).

This was the first International Encounters on Judeo-Spanish and was attended by participants from France, Spain, Turkey, Argentina, Germany. Greece, Bulgaria and Israel.

"The Judeo-Spanish language is being forgotten," said conference co-executive secretary and journalist Moshe Shaul, who has a daily 15-minute program in Ladino at Kol Israel and also publishes the biannual magazine Aki Yerushalaim (Here is Jerusalem).

"It is being used less and less by Sephardim to communicate among themselves, because many of them are completely integrated into the societies of the countries they live in," he said.

The Encounters, initiated and organized by Dr. Gad Nassi, President of Morit — Heritage of Turkish Jewry, under the auspices of former Israel president Yitzhak Navon and with the participation of the Spanish Ambassador to Israel Jose Luis Crespa de Vega, aimed to promote direct communication between institutions, publications, groups and individuals devoted to the preservation of Judeo-Spanish.

Survived over 500 years

It also hoped to establish a framework for devising strategies for saving the Judeo-Spanish heritage, which would decide on the most efficient ways to promote these objectives. This it did in the form of the Judeo-Spanish World Union.

Judeo-Spanish survived more than 500 years in the communities of the Dispersion, but according to Navon, "The majority of Ladino speakers were murdered in the Holocaust. Twenty years ago, some 200,000 people still spoke Ladino," but no research, he pointed out, has been done since.

Lack of teaching materials

"If we are to protect this heritage, it is first necessary to save its incredible treasure of music, songs, tales, literature and folklore, and to document testimonies. But I am pessimistic," he said. "I don't think that Ladino will flourish again on a large scale as a living language."

Marie Christine Varol, a professor of Judeo-Spanish at INALCO, a language institute in Paris, said, "The solution could be to organize more classes in Judeo-Spanish in Turkish and Israeli schools, where there is a Jewish Sephardi population that can perpetuate it."

Abraham Haim, Director of Sephardi Culture at Israel's Ministry of Education and Culture, pointed out that the Ministry presently supports the teaching of Judeo-Spanish at the Midreshet Amalia high school in Jerusalem, though at present it is the only program of its kind in Israel.

Most participants agreed that something must be done about the lack of teaching materials, such as dictionaries, books, videos and casettes.

Haim felt that this process of returning to roots would automatically encourage researchers to look more deeply into sources and publish their findings.

"Everyone says that Judeo-Spanish will disappear," said Prof. Ivan Kanchev from Sofia University, "but it seems to me that the language is blooming. Its origins are being rediscovered and there is renewed interest in the language."

Shaul agreed, but added, "If everybody continues to say the language is dying and that nothing can be done, then it will die. But if we fight for its survival, it will live much longer."

Animal paradise at 'supermarket'

Eli Taman and Arnon Tal own Eli's Jungle, an animal "supermarket" just outside Netanya where visitors are free to browse at leisure with their children and enjoy the thousands of fish, birds, rabbits, hamsters, ducks and chickens.

The first of its kind in Israel, the shop stocks all the paraphernalia imaginable to go with the animals, and it supplies animal stores throughout the country.

Taman opened his first pet shop in 1983 while his friend Tal studied marketing and business administration.

After a study visit to the United States to learn the American way of doing things, Taman sold his store and together with Tal opened Netanya's largest pet shop.

In 1990 they wanted to expand their business but had difficulty getting a bank loan. They turned to the American Jewish Joint Committee (JDC)-initiated Netanya Small Business Development Centre (SBDC), one of a network of eleven SBDCs throughout the country, which assisted them in preparing a professional business plan.

This time, when they applied to the bank with the plan, they received a substantial loan, which they used to enlarge their booming business. They now have a three-building complex and are negotiating purchase of a fourth!

In addition to their love of animals, Taman and Tal want to assist children with developmental disabilities.

With the help of JDC-Israel's division for the disabled, they are planning to set up an innovative pilot program at a high school for children with developmental disabilities.

The students will run a business, growing and breeding birds which will initially be supplied by Eli's Jungle, and Tal will provide the necessary technical assistance and advice.

In addition to raising funds for the school through the sale of the birds, the students will gain practical work experience, self-confidence and independence.

Kol Nidre's simplicity is often overlooked

By ELI OPHEK
Special to The CJN

On the evening of Yom Kippur the prayer of Kol Nidre is recited.

On the surface, it seems a simple prayer. In it, we ask that all vows and promises made between man and God that a person could not fulfil be null and void. In the New Year, we believe, a new page opens for every individual.

However, if we look closely, we find that the simplicity of Kol Nidre was often not recognized either by Jews or Christians.

In fact, today there are four versions of Kol Nidre in orthodox prayer books. The majority of the prayer books in Sephardi ritual use the phrase, "from the last Yom Kippur till this Yom Kippur," concerning the nulification of vows, while most prayer books in Ashkenazi ritual state "from this Yom Kippur till next Yom Kippur" for the negation of vows.

Some prayer books include both phrases, "from the last Yom Kippur till this Yom Kippur and from this Yom Kippur till next Yom Kippur." This is the only change they introduce in the text, all of which is written in the past tense.

Still others use the version, "from the last Yom Kippur till this Yom Kippur and from this Yom Kippur till the next Yom Kippur," and also change the text of the prayer to use both the past and the future.

There is a historical explanation of the different versions of Kol Nidre. The first version, the one in the Sephardi ritual, is the original. It dates from the Talmudic period that ended in the fifth century CE.

Talmudic authorities spoke against the public chanting of Kol Nidre, since they claimed that annulment of vows made in the past were not a simple matter, but required a Beth Din, a religious court. Yet Jewish congregations continued the custom of reciting Kol Nidre on the evening of Yom Kippur.

The Kol Nidre prayer acquired special meaning during historical periods in which Jews were forced to give up their religion and accept Christianity.

For example, in the seventh century CE, under the reign of the Visigoths in Spain, whole Jewish communities were compelled to convert to Christianity. Jews were forced to vow publicly to accept Christianity. But, there were Jews who secretly kept their connection with the religion of their fathers. These were the Marranos.

Marranos gathered in hiding

The Marranos who gathered in hiding for Yom Kippur chose to pray Kol Nidre at the beginning of the evening of Yom Kippur. In this prayer, they declared null and void the vows they had given to their persecutors against their wishes. Only after reciting Kol Nidre, they believed, would their repentance be accepted; they could then be permitted to proceed with the service of Yom Kippur as Jews. It is clear that the Marranos used the original text of Kol Nidre, the version that uses "from the last Yom Kippur till this Yom Kippur."

But the prayer of Kol Nidre was never intended to negate vows and promises between man and his fellow man; it only related to vows between man and God.

Vows and promises between individuals must find their resolution between the individuals themselves and the prayer of Kol Nidre was not intended to provide for their abolition.

However, anti-Semites asserted that the prayer of Kol Nidre dealt with vows and promises between individuals. Therefore, reciting of this prayer they claimed, absolved Jews from vows and promises they gave to others, and made it impossible to believe the word of Jews.

This anti-Semitic position became so strong that in many cases Jews were compelled to swear a "More Judaico" oath in civilian courts in the Middle Ages.

As recently as 1857, Jews in Russia were obliged to add an introduction in Hebrew to the prayer of Kol Nidre, declaring that this prayer did not deal with vows and promises between individuals, the courts, or the community.

Caused hardship for Jews

The anti-Semitic use of Kol Nidre as an argument that vows and promises of Jews could not be trusted, caused much hardship for Jews. Some rabbis tried to change the original Kol Nidre prayer, in order to refute the anti-Semitic claims.

In the 11th century CE, Rabbi Meir Ben Shmuel (the son-in-law of Rashi), changed the original Kol Nidre and introduced a version stating that the content deals with vows and nedarim "from this Yom Kippur till the next Yom Kippur," eliminating the original version, "from the last Yom Kippur till this Yom Kippur."

But this single change in the text is grammatically incorrect because all of the prayer of Kol Nidre is in the past tense: "Dindarna, deishtabana, deacharimna, deisarna," while the phrase, "from this Yom Kippur till next Yom Kippur," is in the future tense.

To use the version of Rabbi Shmuel and to adapt it grammatically to the past tense of the original text, some publications of the Yom Kippur prayer book also changed the prayer text so that it dealt both with the past and the future: "Di nedarna vedi nindar, di ishtabana vedi nishtaba, di acharimna vedi nacharim, di asarna vedi neesar."

These publications also use the version with both phrases, "from last Yom Kippur till this Yom Kippur and from this Yom Kippur till the next Yom Kippur."

In this last version of Kol Nidre, which referred to both the past and the future, the grammar in the text is correct.

But this version of the prayer eliminates the possibility of fulfilment of nedarim and vows, because Kol Nidre here abolishes nedarim and vows both in the past and in the future — "Shevitin oshvikin la shririn vela karamin."

However, the Torah does not speak against nedarim and vows and promises between man and God. On the contrary, it is written in Deuteronomy 23 verses 22-23, "If you make a neder to God do not delay paying it . . . keep the utterance of your mouth and do as you vowed to God."

In every Jewish holiday and Rosh Chodesh when the Hallel is recited, it includes the statement, "My vows to God I shall pay in the audience of his people. . ."

Also, a custom was introduced that certain alliyot to the Torah on the holiday of Simchat Torah were given to those who bid the highest for the purpose of mitzvah. These alliyot were called appropriately "nedarim."

In our time, after the anti-Semitic threat against Kol Nidre has lost its strength, when the Jewish nation is recognized and has rights like other nations, and when the world is more open to understanding the historical truth of Kol Nidre, it is not necessary to be apologetic about this prayer.

Today, it is reasonable to return to the original prayer of Kol Nidre that uses the phrase, "from the last Yom Kippur till this Yom Kippur."

Neglected Tel Aviv port becomes colorful art gallery

World Zionist Press Service

A purple camel rises out of the sea. Two dancers do the tango on the beach, blue abstract sand dunes reaching to the sky. A bird of peace struggles to emerge into the world.

These startling images are some of the artistic creations of more than 300 professional artists, art school students and talented high school students who in one night transformed the neglected old port of Tel Aviv into an animated colorful studio and gallery.

The all-night happening, initiated by Dr. Shosh Avigal, head of the art and culture department of the Tel Aviv municipality, and actor/comic Schmuel Veloshney, starred top Israeli jazz, rock and reggae performers, street actors and stand-up comics. Arts and crafts stalls abounded and a Bedouin tent sold hand-made pita bread, hummus, leben and zatar.

The city's Events Department organized the logistics, including videotaped greetings from Tel Aviv's mayor, art enthusiast Ronni Milo, who was abroad. The event's sponsors were the Hebrew daily Yediot Aharanot, Israel Radio's Reshet Gimmel, which covered the whole event, and two paint companies.

"The event is part of a larger plan to transform the old port from a run-down commercial area to a lively centre for art and fringe theatre," said Avigal, who hopes to turn the wharf's warehouses into artists' exhibition galleries and theatres.

Built in 1936 with permission from the British Mandatory Authority when Jaffa port was closed by a strike, almost half of Tel Aviv's young, able-bodied men were mobilized to build a jetty into the sea. The port was later enlarged, particularly to accommodate the growing demand for Israel's famous Jaffa oranges.

In 1965, when the new deep-water port was built at Ashdod, 20 miles south of Tel Aviv, the 85 dunam port was deactivated. Still run by a port authority, its warehouses are today used by carpet, tile and marble tradesmen, who will shortly be relocated.

The happening was attended by an estimated 40,000 visitors. A large screen presented a film produced by Camera Obscura, a cinema and photography school, and the Koko-Loco entertainers moved among the crowd in Mardi Gras regalia, singing Brazilian songs and adding immensely to the carnival-like atmosphere.

Those who stayed saw the artists put the finishing touches to works done on warehouse walls, roofs, doors and even pavements.

"This is my language," said artist Orna Levi as she completed her purple camel. "An artist doesn't usually have people come to his studio. People see only the finished product."

"It's a beautiful idea to bring color, atmopshere and music to the area," said Simcha Rosenthal, another professional artist.

As new life begins to emerge from the old port. A newly created harbor for small boats is all that is reminiscent of the port's humble beginnings.

Israel's second TV station relies on commercial ads

World Zionist Press Service

It was a long road, but Israel's first commercial TV channel finally took to the airwaves in November 1993.

Although the concept was resisted for more than a decade by various government bodies and political figures, Channel 2 functioned for more than a decade on an experimental basis and was financed from state coffers.

The Second Television and Radio Authority (STRA) now coordinates and controls the New Channel 2's three new franchises — Tel-Ad, Reshet and Keshet.

"This is a big step forward for Israeli TV," says Uzi Peled, managing director of Tel-Ad.

"Israel needs pluralism in television broadcasting and competition is the best way to ensure improved programming," Peled feels. "But a small country like Israel can't support more than one television channel. The only way is to finance them through commercial advertising."

STRA's 15-member council is chaired by Gen. (Res) Yossi Peled and directed by former army spokesman Nachman Shai.

"We decided to base our regulations on the British/European model rather than the American one," says Ayelet Metzger, the New Channel 2 commercials and ratings control manager.

"We make sure ads aren't longer than 90 seconds or less than 10 seconds and allow a maximum of six minutes of advertising per hour. U.S. stations are allowed up to 12 to 14 minutes per hour," she says.

Ads for cigarettes, gambling, private investigative agencies, cults, escort services, contraceptives, firearms and ammunitions, pornography and political messages, are not accepted. Ads for alcoholic beverages, direct marketing, dating services, financial services and vitamins for children are limited. Popular TV stars cannot appear in ads one hour before or after their TV programs, and 75 per cent of the ads must be original productions made for the Israeli market.

"We have to be careful. The standards we set now will stand for years," says Metzger.

"It's hard to define our criteria. On one hand, we don't want to become the nation's censor. But on the other hand, there are some things which just cannot be aired," she says. "A lot of it is a question of judgment. Therefore, before I ask for a commercial to be altered, I consult with several people, including our legal advisor."

What doesn't get aired? Metzger cites a commercial which was rejected for using foul language. "It was in poor taste," she explains. "We also rejected one commercial outright, which made unfair comparisons between products."

Setting rates for commercials and selling the actual advertising spots is left to the individual franchises. And although advertisers can opt to air their commercials on programs from all three franchises, they have to sign three separate contracts.

Prices vary from franchise to franchise. "But the differences are not great," says Peled.

Tel-Ad charges $3,000 for 30 seconds of non-prime time TV, while prime time (8 p.m. to 11 p.m.) can cost between $12,000 and $15,000.

Advertisers can request specific programs. "But if they don't know or are unsure, our advertising department will suggest programs with audiences geared to their products," says Peled.

Tel-Ad has a budget of between $20 and $25 million dollars for its first year of operations, but no one, admits Peled, expects any of the franchises to completely cover costs through advertising during this period.

"We have not started off too well," he admits. "We have only 40 per cent penetration — which means that if there are 100 spots, we have only sold 40. But for prime time we are 80 per cent sold and we may even reach 100 per cent by the end of the first year. The problem is with non-prime time," he confesses," and the situation is similar at both Reshet and Keshet."

Nevertheless, Peled is confident that by the second year, Tel-Ad will break even with overall penetration of 75 per cent, making a profit by its third year.

"The first year is a trial run for commercial TV," says New Channel 2 spokeswoman Tali Ben-Avi. "The important thing is that we have begun and I think the results so far are quite good."

As to the influence advertising will have on programming, Peled believes it is too early to tell.

"Eventually, we need to derive 100 per cent of our revenue from advertising," he says. "If we don't, then the shareholders will have to make up the difference. And if there are programs that we can't sell advertising for because of low ratings, they will have to be dropped. So, I suppose there will be some influence on program content."

Commercial TV caught Israeli advertising agencies unprepared. After years of government delays, advertising agencies were not ready with home-grown commercials.

Commercials during the first two months of operation were mainly those made abroad for international products such as Colgate and Lancia, existing ads being screened in Israeli movie theatres, or those inserted at the beginning of movie video cassettes.

"The advertising agencies are now working on developing commercials specifically for TV," says Peled, "and we are already starting to get new and original ads for the Israeli market."

Despite this slow start, viewers have expressed satisfaction with the ads. A survey commissioned by STRA and carried out by Teleseker over a two week period in mid-November 1993, found 73 per cent of viewers in favor of TV commercials and 69 per cent comfortable with the amount of time devoted to ads. The survey also found 76 per cent to be pleased with the overall quality of the commercials.

"Even though some of the commercials are the same as those in the movies, I still like them," enthused one Israeli teenager.

One of the most talked about ads, and also according to Metzger one of the most popular, is an ad for Castro, an Israeli clothing manufacturer.

A young man, wearing a long coat, is seen from behind opening his coat. From the expression on the faces of the people in the street, it is clear that he is a flasher. The camera then shifts to an attractive young woman walking down the street wearing a full-length coat. The flasher approaches her and flashes. She keeps on walking and then turns, and with a sly smile opens her coat and flashes back at him.

TV advertising has already claimed its first victim — the closing of the Hebrew daily newspaper Hadashot in December 1993.

"Our decision to close was based on the forecast for the future financial performance of Hadashot, says publisher Amos Schoken. "Our forecasts showed that certain advertisers would reduce their investments in the newspaper."

Alex Giladi, director of Kesher, was not at all surprised that commercial TV was having a visible impact on the local media.

"Israel is no different from the rest of the world," he notes.

"The introduction of commercial television is going to increase the advertising market as a whole, but it is also going to take a bite out of the share going to existing markets," he says. The question that remains is the size of this share."

Reshet, Keshet and Tel-Ad will certainly be banking on a good sized one.

SHOFAR TO MOSCOW

High Holy Day kits were distributed to Jewish schools and synagogues across the former Soviet Union by the American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee. Here, Semyon Ravinski (left) shows his great-grandson Genia a shofar.

In search of a service...

By ALEXANDRA WALL
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

In August, I usually begin my yearly quest for a High Holy Day service. Which synagogue is located close enough to my apartment, which service is the most egalitarian, where is the rabbi the most spiritually fulfilling?

Last year, however, I, along with my cousin Stephen, found myself travelling in Southeast Asia, dropping in on High Holy Day services where we could find them.

Little did I think I would end up on Yom Kippur in the crowded women's section of a synagogue in Bangkok, Thailand.

We arrived in Bangkok and witnessed what we had only heard about from Israelis: stores with Hebrew signs, restaurants with Hebrew menus boasting falafel and Israeli salad on the menu, Hebrew shouted in the streets and bazaars and a large Hebrew-speaking enclave of backpackers among the rest of the tourists staying in the cheap accommodation area called Khao San Road. All the Hebrew made a very alien city seem not so very foreign.

We then travelled to Indonesia, where all that suddenly changed. At this time last year, Israelis were still prohibited from traveling in Indonesia, a Muslim country with ties to the Arab world. (Only recently has Indonesia opened itself up to Israeli organized groups, but not to independent travelers.)

While the volcanoes and temples of Indonesia made the visit worthwhile, I never felt fully comfortable there as a Jew.

We made sure to return to Bangkok the day before erev Yom Kippur, so as not to miss Kol Nidre. But due to the infamous traffic jams of Bangkok, we ended up missing it anyway.

Sitting in a gridlocked taxi cab, we grew more nervous as sundown approached. As we neared the area, we got stuck in traffic that wouldn't move. Already late, we decided to get out and walk the last bit, having no idea how far we were.

I had received some instructions from the rabbi on the telephone, but finding our way proved to be confusing. We hurried along, turning down narrow streets called sois, until finally we saw it: a large Magen David set in a window, rising above a wall outside the Beit Alisheva Synagogue.

There, in one of the most foreign-feeling countries I had ever visited, was a symbol linking me to one of the more constant, comforting aspects of my life.

I hadn't considered what kind of service it would be, but I definitely was not prepared for what was there. First, I did not expect so many people. The Jewish community of Thailand, while in constant flux, has a permanent community which numbers approximately 200 people.

They are a mixed bunch: Westerners who are drawn to Thailand for business, retirees, Israeli diplomats and embassy officials and quite a large number in the jewelry business.

There is no one way to please such a diverse community, so the congregation is dubbed just "Jewish" by its Lubavitch Rabbi Yosef Kantor.

Having grown up in a strictly Reform home, I found it amusing that the only Orthodox service I had attended in my adult life was in, of all places, Bangkok.

The services were in themselves unremarkable, although when it came time for the worshipers to re-enact prayer from the ancient temple by kneeling down in complete submission to God, one of Bangkok's usual mid-afternoon thunder showers began, casting an especially odd feeling over the proceedings.

As the entire men's section bowed and knelt, thunder and lightning roared from above.

During the break-the-fast, we were able to speak with some of the congregants, and to feast on both Western- and Israeli-style food.

We spoke with an American man who had retired to Thailand after he visited once and saw a sign signaling "Welcome Home" go off in his head.

We met Israeli backpackers who came mostly for the free meal. We met a Canadian man who was at the beginning of a few years' stay to work in the Canadian Embassy.

We met the president of the congregation, whose parents were American, but was himself born in Thailand. We met several Iranian families who had fled Iran when the Ayatollah Khomeini came to power.

Whatever brought this diverse group of people to Thailand, we all found ourselves in synagogue together on Yom Kippur.

To have that sense of belonging again, the feeling that one is a part of something infinitely larger and more vast, especially in a country filled with golden pagodas — it was truly wonderful to travel so far, and yet find something so familiar.

First natural medicine research unit launched

Jerusalem Dateline

The first interdisciplinary research unit for natural medicine in the Middle East, is being established at the Hadassah Hospital (Ein Kerem) in Jerusalem.

"The unit is unique in Israel because of its emphasis on research," explains its head, Dr. Sarah Sallon, a pediatrician with fieldwork experience in India, Tibet and Ethiopia.

"We will try to quantify how effective natural medicines are in a research- rather than treatment-oriented perspective," she says.

"One of the main problems in this field has been the lack of interaction between botanists, epidemiologists, chemists, biologists, physicians and the pharmaceutical companies and people with expertise in the fields of traditional or alternative medicine. We hope to act as a catalyst."

The unit hopes initially to create a database of a rare and unique collection of plants. These specimens document the medicinal lore of several groups in British Mandate Palestine, as well as of immigrant Jewish populations from places such as Yemen and North Africa, who brought a centuries-old tradition of herbal medicine to Israel when they arrived in the late '40s and early '50s.

That this lore has been documented is particularly significant in the light of vast and rapid modernization. It is also important in view of the increasing reliance on modern medicine and the fact that knowledge of traditional medicine and plant lore is rapidly slipping into oblivion and is in danger of being lost to future generations.

The unit hopes in the future to offer pharmaceutical companies the service of doing research into particular plants, in conjunction with clinicians and scientists in the Hadassah Hospital Medical School.

The first natural medicine to be tested in the Hadassah unit is a traditional Tibetan medicine, Padma 28. In recent studies at Hadassah, this preparation, produded in Switzerland, has been found to act as a powerful anti-oxidant, countering the clogging of arteries.

Padma 28 is a preparation comprising over 22 components.

What the Hadassah Unit for Natural Medicine Research is in a unique position to offer — and what gives it the edge over similar centres, for example, in the United States — is the cost-effective research aspect.

The combination of high levels of expertise with a relatively low wage scale compared to the United States makes research in this country a very attractive proposition.

Furthermore, Sallon hopes that, with the development of the peace process in Israel, the unit will be able to share and collaborate with Israel's neighbors on research in the Middle East.

Ancient cache of coins discovered off Haifa coast

Jerusalem Dateline

A trove of silver coins from the Hellenic period, one of the largest treasures of its type ever found in Israel, was discovered off the Haifa coast by the Marine Division of the Israel Antiquities Authority (IAA).

The find includes a mass of coins weighing approximately 21 kg and some 1,800 other coins weighing roughly another 20 kg. The coins, known as tetradrachmas, were all minted in Paphos in the year 145 BCE, during the reign of Emperor Ptolemy VI Philometor.

The obverse of each coin bears the portrait of the emperor; on the reverse is a large eagle, the symbol of the Ptolemaic emperors. The mint mark and the year of mintage appear next to the eagle.

These coins were valuable in the Hellenistic period; the archive of Xenon, a Greek who lived in Egypt in the third century BCE, explains that the daily wage of an ordinary hired soldier was one-fourth of a silver tetradrachma.

In the first and second centuries BCE, Coele-Syria, as the country was known, played an important role in the economy of the Ptolemaic empire, as the transit routes from the Far east crossed it. Large merchant vessels plied the country's coast bearing slaves, olive oil, wine, wheat and other grains.

Ya'akov Sharvit, a marine archaeologist with the IAA, notes that the coins off the Haifa coast belonged to the cargo of a ship that had sailed north from Egypt and foundered near Haifa.

Sharvit believes that the cache of coins probably represented either payment for goods and slaves carried by a coastal mechant vessel or the wages of Ptolemy's hired soldiers.

Historical sources make it clear that the alliance between the Ptolemaic ruler of Egypt and the ruler of Coele-Syria broke up in 145 BCE, whereupon Ptolemy's troops advanced up the coast of Coele-Syria.

The Cuban Jews of Miami

By MIRIAM CHINSKY
Special to The CJN

At Temple Beth Shmuel, the Cuban Hebrew Congregation of Miami, it is not uncommon for both kishke and black beans with rice to be on the same dinner menu.

Contemporary Jewish immigration to Cuba (earlier Jewish communities had died out) is considered to date back to the end of the 1898 Spanish American War.

A small group of U.S. citizens, mainly Romanian born, entered the country after first settling in Florida. Further immigration came from Turkey in 1913, Eastern Europe starting in 1921, Germany in the late 1930s, and the camps and hiding places of Holocaust survivors after World War II.

The wandering Jews stayed long enough to forge cultural and language ties, but the majority of the approximately 15,000 in the Jewish community made their way to the United States, together with other Cubans, during the exodus precipitated by the 1959 Castro-led revolution.

Most settled in Miami or Miami Beach, where there are currently up to four generations of Jews of European and Middle Eastern origin, those born in Cuba and young Americans.

To the outsider they are vitually indistinguishable from other Cuban immigrants. However, there are differences. Walk into one clothing store on Collins Avenue and you're greeted in Spanish, but the proprietor tosses a few Yiddish words over his shoulder to his wife at the back.

During Pesach you'll notice an open box of matzoh beside the cash register in the children's wear shop at the corner of Lincoln Road and Collins Avenue.

Population estimates vary widely, but Cuban-born George Feldenkreis, vice-president of the Greater Miami Jewish Federation, insists that there are at least 10,000 Ashkenazim and 7,000 Sephardim of Cuban background within the community. Occupations are diverse — retail, commercial, professional.

Relations with other Cuban immigrants are good, but the Jewish sector does its own thing, according to Feldenkreis.

Conservative Temple Beth Shmuel, a beautiful contemporary building, has a 90 per cent Ashkenazi Cuban congregation. Orthodox Temple Moses is largely Sephardi Cuban, and Temple Menorah which is Conservative, includes a mix of Cuban, Central and South American congregants.

As the community exits to the suburbs, there is a tendency to join local synagogues (the core shuls do not have religious schools) but, notes Mario Chyzyk, vice-president of Temple Beth Shmuel, the bond is strong and original memberships are usually retained as well.

Feldenkreis and Chyzyk agree that there is less intermarriage than in the general Jewish community. Cuban Jews will marry American Jews, but are less likely to marry non-Jews.

Parental control remains firm, in the Latin tradition. Young people are encouraged to participate in a well supervised one-semester High School in Israel program but are discouraged from studying at universities abroad. "We like to keep our children close to home," says Feldenkreis' wife Mariita.

There is a Cuban B'nai Brith lodge and a Spanish speaking Hadassah chapter. And there is a Cuban committee within the Miami Jewish Federation. Support for the Federation is solid, with annual contributions from the apparently affluent Cuban community totalling one million dollars, with particular concern for Israel.

But Cuban Jews in Florida face a dilemma in their relations with the dwindling Jewish population of some 1,000 in Cuba, because they, like other Cuban emigres, are reluctant to prop up Castro by sending goods and cash.

For 25 years, says former Canadian Jewish Congress Ontario region director Edmond Lipsitz, Canadian Jews financed Passover shipments to Cuba, sending them via Russian and Polish vessels out of Montreal.

In the past three years, since the Soviet breakup and consequent reduction of shipping, the Floridian Cuban Jews have been donating a portion of the cost of the Passover shipment through the Federation, which in turn funnels it to the American Joint Distribution Committee.

The AJDC then sends the Passover shipment, still generously supported by Canadian Jewish Congress, through Mexico City to its destination.

Quebec opens door to full funding for Jewish schools

By JANICE ARNOLD
CJN Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Jewish day schools will receive 100 per cent funding for secular studies from the Quebec government by 1997-98, Education Minister Jacques Chagnon announced last week. The funding is contingent on the success of negotiations between the Association of Jewish Day Schools (AJDS) and the Montreal Catholic School Commission (MCSC) on establishing an official link.

At a press conference at Hebrew Academy in Cote St. Luc, Chagnon presented a letter of agreement between the ministry and the AJDS authorizing "associate status" for the 16 member schools with the MCSC.

Once that relationship is finalized, the government will increase its subsidies incrementally from the present 60 per cent level to 100 per cent over four years, Chagnon said.

Government funding of the Jewish schools is per student and tied to the public school rate. Thus, a 100 per cent funding means a Jewish school would receive the same grant per student as a public school.

In dollars, that means an increase from the current $18 million to about $30 million "in today's terms," the minister said.

The current total budget of the 16 schools, housed in 22 buildings, and with an enrolment of almost 7,000, is $40 million annually, said AJDS director-general Joe Rabinovitch. Among the 16 are the Orthodox communities' yeshivot and girls' academies.

Rabinovitch emphasized that the minister's authorization is "the first of a two-step process" and that no agreement has been made with the MCSC yet.

"It's an agreement in principle with the minister. Now we have to meet with the MCSC," he said. Rabinovitch expects those talks to take another four months. The AJDS has held exploratory meetings with the MCSC, whose president Francois Ouimet, resigned to run as a Liberal candidate. There was no MCSC representative at the press conference.

The minister's authorization of the associate status was made by decree, which Rabinovitch said "has the force of law." Should there be a change in government, it could be undone only through legislation, he said.

The Jewish community has been discussing associate status with government officials for some five years now, AJDS president Barry Rishikof said.

He said he believed association with a public school board will not result in any loss of autonomy for the Jewish schools, which will continue to be classified as private schools. The exact terms of the relationship are to be worked out in the anticipated talks with the MCSC.

The Jewish schools had associate status with the Protestant School Board of Greater Montreal (PSBGM) until the late '60s. At that time, they accepted an offer to become private from the then premier, Union Nationale leader Daniel Johnson Sr., the father of the present Liberal premier. For years, government funding amounted to 80 per cent, but this has gradually declined.

Over the same period, the day schools increasingly accepted students who were unable to pay full or any fees, as well as those requiring specialized education, Rishikof said. Association with the MCSC should enable the Jewish schools to gain from its pedagogical expertise in these areas, he said.

The AJDS had been talking with the PSBGM about association and the board passed a resolution of approval in principle a couple of years ago.

But, Rabinovitch said, it was felt by the Jewish community that associating with the largest francophone school board in the province would "send the message that the Jewish community has a place here in Quebec and wishes to integrate into the society."

Indeed, Chagnon hailed such an association as "evidence of a great openness of spirit" and "furthering social integration and intercultural collaboration."

The announcement was heavy with political overtones. At Chagnon's side were D'Arcy McGee Liberal candidate Lawrence Bergman and Industry Minister Gerald Tremblay, the Outremont incumbent.

Morocco establishes relations with Israel

Jewish Telegraphic Agency

TEL AVIV — On the eve of the Jewish New Year, Morocco became the second Arab country to establish diplomatic ties with Israel.

Last Thursday, the two countries announced that they would soon open liaison offices in Tel Aviv and Rabat, the Moroccan capital.

"For us it's a beautiful present on the holiday, but it is beyond a holiday present," Israeli Foreign Minister Shimon Peres told Army Radio.

"The majority of relations that we have focused on were bilateral with states neighboring us. This is an opening of a regional system of relations," said Peres.

Morocco also announced that it would simultaneously open a representative office to the Palestinian governing authority in Gaza. The PLO has had what is termed an "embassy" in Rabat for many years.

Morocco and Israel have long had de facto relations, with King Hassan II serving as an intermediary in Israel's peace efforts over the years.

Speculation over Israeli-Moroccan ties has been rife since the signing of the Israeli-Palestinian accord in Washington last September. Returning from the Washington ceremony, Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin and Peres stopped off in Morocco, their first public visit to the country.

For some time, Morocco has encouraged tourism and even trade with Israel, where 600,000 Israelis claim Moroccan descent.

In its announcement of the establishment of an interest section in Rabat, the Foreign Ministry said that the offices were being set up "according to the rules and norms detailed in the Vienna Treaty on diplomatic relations."

It was not immediately clear when the exchange of offices would take place.

Lester Pollack, chair of the U.S.-based Conference of Presidents of Major American Jewish Organizations, met with the king last Wednesday to discuss plans for a regional economic conference Hassan will host in October.

Rabin and Peres last month received invitations to the conference, which will include government and business representatives from countries such as Jordan and possibly Saudi Arabia, as well as Western business leaders.

Rucker named to IRB

OTTAWA — Canadian Jewish News editor Patricia Rucker has been named to the Immigration and Refugee Board for a three-year term.

The appointment was one of 57 announced last week by Immigration Minister Sergio Marchi. Of those, 18 were re-appointments.

Rucker was named editor of The CJN in 1989. Prior to that, she was the paper's assignment editor and political reporter.

She joins several other Jewish appointees to the IRB, including community figures Alan Rose and Ian Kagedan, who were named a few weeks ago; and activist Mindy Skapinker.

Hamilton lawyer Max Wolpert and Toronto communal figure Max Schecter were re-appointed to the board.

Ethnic groups seek funding equality

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — It's deja vu all over again. A coalition of Christian, Muslim, Sikh and Hindu parents are proposing an arrangement for public funding of private schools that was first suggested by the Jewish community 16 years ago.

The parents are asking an Ontario court to rule that they are suffering religious discrimination in the public school system, contrary to the freedom of religion and equality sections of the Charter of Rights and Freedoms.

They are hoping that a favorable ruling will permit public school boards to consider permitting religiously-oriented schools from these communities to come under the umbrella of the public system, as was proposed in North York in 1978 for Associated Hebrew Schools, said Peter Jervis, the lawyer representing the parents.

"Our case is the same type of proposal as [suggested] in 1978, the development of alternative religious schools within the public school system for religious minorities," Jervis said.

The case is distinguished from one brought by five Jewish parents, supported by Canadian Jewish Congress, and several Christian parents, suppported by the Ontario Alliance of Christian Schools Societies, which is currently before the courts. The parents in that case are asking for full government funding for religious schools that operate outside the public system.

UJA '95 launched as a 'tribute to life'

Campaign goal set at $40 million

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — With voices raw and dialling fingers worn, an army of UJA workers rose from a bank of 130 telephones last September feeling somewhat triumphant and giddy.

In the one-day fundraising marathon known as Super Sunday, some 700 volunteers working in shifts had made about 40,000 telephone calls, spoken with occupants of some 20,000 Jewish homes — and raised about $2 million, or five per cent of the charity's annual target of $40 million, all in one day.

Super Sunday falls on September 11 this year, and volunteers again hope that members of the Jewish community will reach deep into their pockets when the UJA calls.

The theme of this year's campaign is Saving Jewish Lives, and the $2 million that has again been set as the target for the one-day fundraising extravaganza has already been earmarked for a diverse range of vital social welfare and educational programs, both here and in Israel.

"In the best Jewish tradition, UJA '95 is a tribute to life — saving Jewish lives so no Jew stands alone," campaign co-chair Wendy Eisen told 500 volunteers at the campaign launch and training session recently held at the Inn on the Park Hotel.

The first appeal by the UJA's predecessor, the Federation of Jewish Philanthropies, took place in Toronto in 1917 and raised $20,000.

The UJA has set a target of $40 million for this year's campaign, which runs until the end of the year.

Guest speaker at the UJA '95 campaign launch was Allen Pollack, a New York City-based university professor who is currently writing a book on the collapse of the Soviet Union. Pollack soon made clear the appropriateness of the campaign's theme, Saving Jewish Lives.

In the post-Cold War era, atrocities committed in places like Sarajevo and Rwanda are becoming tragically common, he said. "They are not the exception to the rule, they are the rule. They are symptomatic of what may come all over Eastern Europe."

He characterized Eastern Europe as a swirling vortex of tragic possibilities, a place in which average living conditions have deteriorated since the collapse of communism, and where people have a historic propensity for blaming the Jews for their social problems.

"If you want to get a clear picture of what is going on in Eastern Europe today, read a history of Weimar Germany," he said.

A specialist in Russian history and the role of Jews in the revolutionary movement of Czarist Russia, Pollack observed that we live in a world of transition since the collapse of the Soviet Union and the end of the U.S.-Soviet Cold War, when the rules of engagement seemed clear.

"The world of 10 years ago was a very dangerous one, with the possibility of nuclear holocaust. Yet, with all its turmoils and difficulties, the one thing I can tell you about that world is that, at that time, anyone who went to sleep at night knew what the world would be like the next day.

"Today, the dangers of global disintegration are gone, but I can tell you with absolute certainty, when you go to bed tonight, you don't know what the world will be like tomorrow. The world we're facing now, while theoretically safer, is much more dangerous."

"What is the lesson of Yugoslavia? The lesson of Yugoslavia is that a new nation decided to do whatever it wanted to do, like Saddam Hussein in Iraq. Ethnic cleansing is allowed. Concentration camps are allowed. Raping and pillaging are allowed. This is going on in places we don't even talk about ... Because the proper rules have not been set, nobody knows where this will go."

When communism first collapsed in the East, many Jews had a telling reaction, said Pollack.

"The first reaction of the Jews of Eastern Europe was not to sing and dance. Their first reaction was to run like mad, because they could almost smell instinctively what might happen there. The fact that we brought a half-million home (to Israel) is one of the modern miracles of our people."

The same factors that are producing turmoil in Eastern Europe have ironically acted in favor of peace in the Middle East, Pollack observed.

"The Arabs know that they're living in a new sort of world, one that is dominated by the United States. They know that they have to do what the United States wants, which is to make peace with Israel.

"We have within our hands the possibility of doing in this generation what hundreds of years of Jewish history and millions of Jews could only dream about," said Pollack.

"We can yet see what we all dreamed about, an Israel living in peace in the Middle East, an Israel devoting its time to being a light unto all nations ... We have for so long been a people living in fear. We can yet see ourselves as a people living in hope."

Pollack reminded his listeners of the necessity for Jews to remember history and not to be entirely consumed by the problems of the moment.

"I believe that you can't be a Jew today if you don't believe in your heart of hearts that the Messiah will come. To be a Jew means you have to have absolute faith that a better world is coming. In the meantime, until that better world is here, we have to keep both feet on the ground."

Woolfe helped Mounties 'Maintain the Right'

By MAURICE LUCOW
CJN Western Correspondent

VANCOUVER — On the eve of a new century, longtime Vancouver resident Harry Woolfe looks back wistfully at the early days of this one, days when Mounties kept the laws and the movies were silent.

Harry, 95, played a role in the story of those early days. He served with the Royal North-West Mounted Police (RNWMP), predecessor to the Royal Canadian Mounted Police (RCMP), and is now its oldest living member.

He also is a charter member of the Variety Club of British Columbia, the showbiz club he joined as a movie distributor in 1966, and a designated Canadian Motion Pictures Pioneer.

To top it off, Harry and wife Debbie, who is a couple of years younger, celebrated their 69th wedding anniversary in June. Both early residents of Calgary, they married in New York.

Harry Woolfe was born in London, England, in 1899. His father, a builder and gunsmith, took the family to Canada in 1910, settling in Calgary, where he helped build the city's first synagogue. As a gunsmith he did work for the RNWMP — an organization which fascinated young Harry.

The North-West Mounted Police was established in 1873 as the sole law enforcement agency for Canada's new territories. The force patrolled the Prairies from the American border to the far reaches of the Northwest Territories and the Yukon, becoming "Royal" in 1904. In 1920 the RNWMP merged with the Dominion Police to become the RCMP.

By 17, Harry had joined the force as a police officer and took his training at the Regina headquarters. Like all military-type institutions, the pay wasn't great — 50 cents a day "and all the oats I could steal from my horse," he recalls, but "I loved it."

Debbie and Harry Woolfe.

Harry spoke from his comfortable apartment in the Kerrisdale area, where he and Debbie live on their own. Pictures of Harry with some of the Mounties' top brass hang in the hallway. He says he doesn't get around much now but did drive his car until he was 91.

Harry's training included learning how to survive the cold and empty prairies in the winter and how to ride a horse under any condition. A picture of him proudly mounted on his steed now hangs on the wall of the Jewish Community Centre of Vancouver in a collection of photos exhibited by the Jewish Historical Society of British Columbia.

He also has a picture of an early car, so primitive the gas tank sits on the running board. The RNWMP didn't use the car to chase crooks — that was done on horseback — but for routine inter-office work.

Harry's RNWMP uniform was a scarlet tunic, navy breeches with a gold stripe down the sides, high leather boots and a specially-created Stetson hat. The uniform was similar to what Mounties today wear on dress parade.

In the winter, the police wore three-quarter length reefer coats made of buffalo, with matching buffalo hats. They also wore fleece-lined long johns in weather that often dipped to 40 or 50 degrees below zero.

Harry still wears around his neck a button from his tunic, mounted on a small plaque upon which is inscribed the RNWMP motto: Maintiens le Droit (Maintain the Right). The button features a fierce looking bison, typical of the animals that roamed the plains in the early days.

After finishing his training, Const. Woolfe was assigned to the RNWMP detachment in Yorkton, Sask., north of Regina. It was in Yorkton that the Bronfman family founded its empire with the Balmoral Hotel — a popular eating place for the young cops.

It was bitterly cold in the winter, with few farm homes in which a patrolling officer could drop in on to warm up. And it was hot in the summer. "Life was tough," Harry says, "but I was young — it was fun. It was a great experience but I'm not sure if I'd want to go through it again."

He says his patrols didn't result in any major captures or rescues, "but we had some trouble with Peter Verigin and his Doukhobors," a pacifist Russian sect rejecting secular governments that first settled in Yorkton in 1898. The Doukhobors would strip naked as a gesture of protest, a no-no in those days.

When World War I broke out, Harry served in France with a special RNWMP contingent attached to the Canadian calvary. He left the force after the war and joined the RCMP Veterans Association (registration number 6607). Debbie says he always gets a standing ovation at veterans' functions.

Harry went into the new-fangled movie business, starting as a shipper for Paramount Pictures in Calgary. In 1923 he took a job in Cincinnati as a film distributor for Universal Pictures. His job took him all over, including a monthly trip into Kentucky mountain country to meet shanty theatre operators. "I travelled on horseback," he says, "and carried a pistol. It was a pretty wild place back then."

Harry returned to Calgary in 1938 to become branch manager for RKO. Five years later he took over management of film distribution for United Artists in Vancouver, a position he held until retirement. He later started his own business booking films for the province's independent theatres.

The Jewish Historical Society of Southern Alberta, in its January 1991 journal, said of Harry: "Although he has spent nearly half a century on the Coast, Harry remains a distinguished and colorful part of the history of our Calgary community. With pride we salute one of the pioneers — Harry Woolfe."

Polish newspaper publishes anti-Semitic book excerpts

By BEN ROSE
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — A Polish newspaper published in Edmonton, Kulisy Polonii, printed extracts from the Protocols of the Elders of Zion in its June 30 issue, resulting in a protest and a request for an apology by the Jewish Federation of Edmonton.

In its Aug. 26 issue, the publisher and editor, Josef Lenik, printed a full-page reply to the protest, headed Is the Kulisy Polonii anti-Semitic?.

The Federation does not yet have a full translation of the Polish paper's reply and is holding off any response to determine if, indeed, it is an apology.

Officials of the Canadian Polish Congress told The Jewish Free Press in Calgary they were "appalled" at the publication of the excerpts.

When he printed the extracts from the Protocols, the notorious Russian czarist forgery, Lenik ran a foreword saying he had been asked by readers of the paper to run it.

In a subsequent interview with Judy Shapiro, editor of the Jewish Free Press in Calgary, Lenik defended the paper's right to print the extracts.

"As a publisher I have to inform poeple that such a book exists," he told Shapiro. "It was not my intention to make people hate Jews, but only to provide information about this book."

Lenik said the disclaimer stated that the Protocols are not true and were probably written by somebody who hates Jews.

"People know about this book but don't know what's in it," Lenik said. "It is my duty to inform people."

His Aug. 26 issue reply is addressed to both the Jewish Federation and to Sigmund Sobolewski, a Polish Catholic survivor of Auschwitz and resident of Fort Assiniboine, Alta.

Lenik wrote: "If I offended you, I am sorry. If I offended the Jewish community, I feel sorry as well. It was not my intention."

He called the Protocols a "historical oddity" and claimed Poles cannot be so easily swayed by old stories.

Lenik also wrote that he wishes the Jewish community all the best, as he does all communities, including Hindus and Germans.

With a circulation of 5,000 nationally Kulisy Polonii is an independent newspaper, but does receive the support of the Canadian Polish Congress, which publishes an insert in the paper every two months.

Prof. Karol Krotki, a member of the executive of the Canadian Polish Congress and editor of the insert, called the Protocols' publication "the very bottom to which journalism can fall."

Printing the Protocols, he said, "is not a service. Society does not need that kind of enlightenment."

Canadian Polish Congress president Joseph Bereznicki said he was "appalled" at the action of the Polish newspaper.

Bereznicki reported that he had spoken to the publisher of Kulisy Polonii and was told Lenik had been on vacation and the material "slipped through."

"We expressed our dismay and this matter will be discussed at our next meeting," Bereznicki said.

The excerpts printed included allegations that Jews were responsible for many of the world's most violent altercations, from the French Revolution to World War I. Other segments allege Jews control the world gold supply and the news media, and want to establish a world government under Jewish control.

Both positions require high energy, creative team players, who enjoy working with dedicated volunteers and can take the ball and run. The positions are available as of late Fall, 1994. Resumes should be sent to the Jewish Federation of Greater Vancouver, 200-950 West 41st Avenue, Vancouver, B.C. attention: Executive Director.

TEENAGE EXODUS

More than 500 Jewish teenagers from around the world participated in "Exodus" this past summer. Sponsored by WZO and the Jewish Agency, the program sought to recreate the journey of thousands of Jewish refugees who fled to Palestine in the 1930s and '40s. The teens boarded a boat in Brindisi, Italy, and spent three days at sea, imagining themselves as refugees, before landing in Israel. NAME GAME

There is a story in almost every Jewish surname and Toronto lawyer FRED M. CATZMAN has been researching their origins over the past few years. Mr. Catzman reports on his research in The CJN.

BALDOCK

John Freeman, of Toronto, has submitted an intriguing enquiry about the origin of his grandfather's surname, which he recalls from childhood memories as Baldock. His grandfather lived in Plonsk, a town near Warsaw, Poland, where he was "some kind of leader in the community."

These skimpy clues are not enough to solve the mystery. I can find no shtetl in Poland that even resembles Baldock. I can conjure up only two far-fetched solutions, which I offer with diffidence.

Baldachim is the Polish word for canopy, which suggests that his grandfather either manufactured chuppahs or solemnized marriage under a chuppah.

The alternative is to consider that his grandfather had developed skill as a hornblower (of the shofar or ram's horn) and was therefore referred to as the Baal-Tekiya. Baltokiyah is an authentic name recorded in Kiev.

Waterloo receives unusual donation for Holocaust education

By RON CSILLAG
CJN Staff Reporter

KITCHENER — A recent contribution to the Waterloo County Holocaust Education Committee came from a decidedly unexpected donor.

The $250 cheque was signed by Harold Eidt, who earlier this summer pleaded guilty to one count of uttering a death threat against a group of Jewish protesters.

The donation had been ordered by Judge Colin Westman of the Ontario Court (Provincial Division), who handed Heidt a suspended sentence on the death threat charge but placed him on one year's probation and fined him $100 for failing to obey unrelated bail conditions.

The idea for the contribution came from committee member Jack Somer after consultations with assistant Crown attorney David Russell.

"It's an unusual donation," Somer told The CJN. "That's for sure."

The charge against Eidt was laid in November 1992, when he confronted a group of protesters outside the Kitchener stereo shop owned by Michael Rothe.

Rothe's store windows often display printed material that questions the Holocaust and it was at his shop that British Holocaust revisionist David Irving spoke in late 1992, just days before he was ordered deported from Canada.

Rothe's shop is also a well-known meeting place for Canadian neo-Nazis.

Protesters, mostly Jewish and some Holocaust survivors, held thrice-weekly vigils outside the store in the autumn of 1992 to call public attention to Rothe's neo-Nazi connections.

The Court heard that on Nov. 13, 1992, Eidt, then 19, exchanged words with the protesters, one of whom allegedly spat on him.

Eidt threatened "to get a gun and kill them all," according to police.

According to a witness interviwed by The CJN after the incident, Eidt yelled "Heil Hitler!" and returned later in a car with some friends. The car's window was reportedly smashed.

Judge Westman told Eidt he was "not certain, because of your education, if you were equipped" to have understood why the protesters were picketing Rothe's shop.

Somer said the committee uses its funds to further educational programs on the Holocaust within the Waterloo County public and separate school boards.

Beilin's 'anti-charity' policies are slammed by predecessor

By JANICE ARNOLD
CJN Staff Reporter

MONTREAL —Yehuda Ben-Meir, a former Israeli deputy foreign minister in the government of Menachem Begin, rapped the current minister Yossi Beilin for suggesting last year that Israel no longer needs "charity" from the Diaspora

Ben-Meir encouraged Montreal rabbis and synagogue officials to ignore such pronouncements and continue to urge their congregants to buy State of Israel Bonds.

New York-born Ben-Meir scoffed at statements by Beilin and some other Israeli officials that Israel is now economically strong enough that it can borrow money on international markets like any other nation.

Ben-Meir, an ordained rabbi who was first elected to the Knesset in 1971 and served as deputy foreign minister from 1981-84, was guest speaker at a luncheon for Bonds' Synagogue Division, held at Adath Israel Poale Zedek Congregation.

The event launched Bonds' Shomrei Shalom (Guardians of Peace) High Holy Day campaign.

Rabbi Gavriel Newman of Congregation Chevra Kadisha-B'nai Jacob sought clarification from Ben-Meir on the confusion that has been created by conflicting statements from government officials on the value of the Bonds program.

"The people of Israel see world Jewry, and especially North American Jewry, as our partners in establishing and maintaining the Jewish state," Ben-Meir said.

He attributed Israel's current economic strength to the $14 billion (U.S.) in State of Israel securities purchased worldwide since 1951.

"That's the way Israel with 5 million people has a GNP higher than Egypt with 55 million people," he said.

Rabbi Newman said some rabbis are having trouble getting people to buy Bonds because they heard Israeli Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin had committed $25 million to the Palestinians.

Ben-Meir stressed that "100 per cent" of Bonds purchases go to "Israel and Jews, not Arabs."

Bonds campaign kickoff

Ben-Meir explained that that money will mainly come from a return of taxes deducted from the wages of Palestinians who work in Israel to the Palestinian authorities in Gaza and Jericho to establish a fund for pensions and other social benefits. In addition, Israel will remit to the Palestinian authorities the customs it collects on goods destined for Gaza and Jericho that come through Israeli ports, he said.

To another question, Ben-Meir replied that funds from Bond sales are distributed equally to the Jewish settlements in the sense that the territories benefit from the national 100 billion shekel budget like any other part of the country.

"The Israel Treasury increased the [interest] rate on Israel Bonds twice in the last month. This is a clear indication of how urgently the money is needed," said Erol Araf, Montreal director of Israel Bonds.

"The Israeli government plans to spend $60 billion (U.S.) over the next 10 years on improvements to the infrastructure, of which $10 billion is to come from Israel Bonds," Araf added.

The rabbis and synagogue executive directors and presidents attending the luncheon were given a letter from Israeli Finance Minister Avraham Shochat in which he asks that they "inspire congregants to invest in Israel Bonds as a means of participating in the great and noble undertaking of building the Jewish state...

"The return of the Jewish people to Eretz Israel is an enterprise in which all Jews should share...It is very important for me to know that Israel has individuals throughout the world who are promoting the Israel Bonds campaign and helping us in our efforts to absorb new immigrants."

The campaign kit also contains a quote from Rabin: "Israel Bonds is measured in two ways. It is measured in dollars, but it has a much deeper meaning: involvement and commitment. I believe that the partnership Israel Bonds has created between Israel and Jewish communities around the world is the key to our success in the past, and to our success in the future."

Rabbis are being urged by Bonds officials to promote the purchase of the securities as an investment, both financial and in "our Jewish heritage and collective future."

Court rejects parents' appeal

The Ontario Court of Appeal has turned down the parents' appeal, but they are preparing to ask the Supreme Court of Canada to hear the case.

The 10 parents represented by Jervis, who are being supported by the Ontario Multi-faith Coalition for Equity in Education (OMCEE), would like to see the implementation of recommendations contained in a 1984 report by educator Bernard Shapiro, who called for public financing for religious schools, Jervis said.

There are precedents for such an approach, the lawyer continued. Calgary has two Jewish, one native and one Christian school operating under the auspices of the public system. In Ontario in the 1970s, a Mennonite school near the Manitoba border that offered religious classes was funded by taxpayers, he said. That school agreed to accept people from any religious group and they made religious instruction and classes optional for students. That differs from the 1978 Jewish proposal which would have made Jewish instruction mandatory, he said.

There are 14 alternative schools in Toronto that come under the auspices of public boards, Jervis asserted. One of them offers native spiritualism as part of its curriculum, opening the school day with a "sweetgrass ceremony," he said.

Gerald Vandezande, government relations coordinator with OMCEE, said, "Our parents feel the public school system doesn't serve them and the government should provide equal treatment for them."

OMCEE "was opposed to the old majoritarianism which forced Christianity down peoples' throats, but we are also opposed to the new majoritarianism which says you must think secularly," he said. Excluding God and religion from schools is in itself a "faith ideal that people in our coalition cannot accept. You can't force people to swallow secularism," he added.

Murray Segal, chair of the Ontario Jewish Association for Equity in Education (OJAEE), a Congress committee, said the approach being advocated by OMCEE is a familiar one.

In 1978, said Segal, Associated Hebrew Schools and the North York board of education agreed to a pilot project that would see the public board pay for the general studies portion of the school day, while Associated would provide the Judaic component. At the time, Ontario law permitted religious instruction in public schools, with the provision that children could opt out of the classes.

To comply with that legislation, Associated agreed that those who wished to opt out could go to another school, but the Judaic portion of the school day was mandatory for all students who attended Associated, Segal said.

Following editorial commentary against that proposal, the minister of education took the case to court, which ruled against the pilot program.

Since then, Ontario courts in the Zilberberg and Elgin County cases have struck down as unconstitutional opening religious exercises and religious instruction of an indoctrinal nature in public schools, Segal said. Congress had joined those cases as interveners and supported the court decisions.

Segal said Congress also supported the Shapiro recommendations, but they have never been implemented.

Segal said OJAEE was not opposed to the inclusion of Jewish schools within the public school umbrella as long as no unreasonable conditions were imposed and as long as religious instruction was mandatory. But given the previous court rulings, Segal said he did not see how that could be the case.

Jervis distinguished the Elgin and Zilberberg cases from what he was proposing by saying Ontario courts had not ruled on a suggestion that students be allowed to "opt in" to religious instruction, as opposed to opting out of mandatory religious instruction and exercises.

'Give us 100,000 more buyers,' U.S. Bonds leader quotes Rabin

By DAVID LAZARUS
CJN Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — The campaign leader for State of Israel Bonds in the United States exhorted Bonds leaders here to step up the pace of unit sales.

According to Susan Volchek, who is presiding this year over the U.S.'s national Bonds campaign, the time has come to move the North American focus away from the multi-million dollar investor to the average person, in order to bring Bonds back to its roots by cementing support for Bonds with a greater number of Jews.

Volchek took part in a recent whirlwind three-day visit to Israel involving 35 Bonds leaders from 22 countries.

She quoted Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin as telling them that broadening the base of support, through "unit sales" of smaller demoninations, should now be the top priority for Bonds canvassers.

Worldwide, the organization has been raising about $1 billion (U.S.) annually.

But Bonds would settle for $100 million (U.S.) less in sales "if you can give us 100,000 more Bonds buyers," Volchek quoted Rabin as telling them.

The main message Rabin conveyed to Volchek and the others was that increasing Bonds' base of support was key to soldifying the ties between average Jews and Israel and to countering the idea that in an era of peace Israel no longer needs State of Israel Bonds.

Volchek said the truth is that the Jewish state needs Bonds investments more than ever before because infrastructure funds are shifting from the "Israel is under threat" mentality to building new infrastructures for tourism, family settlement and education.

"It needs an infrastructure as a pioneer for peace," she said.

Israel's education budget, for example, is going up from $7 billion to $12 billion.

"We have to invest now in brain power to make Israel even stronger in the future," she said.

"We've been lazy," Volchek said to a group of Bonds leaders at the Montreal office. The average member of the Jewish community "has not been buying for one reason. You and I haven't asked them," she said.

Myer Samuels, Canadian president for State of Israel Bonds, said the new strategy will involve moving towards a 60 per cent sale of instruments through Bonds, and 40 per cent through "notes," the organization's term for the instruments of at least $250,000.

One technique, he said, will be to have "all synagogue members be a Bonds-holder."

A national meeting of Canadian Bonds leaders is set to take place soon to set Canada-wide strategy.

At the international level, the strategy to increase the base of support will focus on a program called "Israel 2000."

The program involves the joint participation of the United States, Canada and Mexico in encouraging potential Bonds purchasers to tour Israeli universities and hospitals, purchase Bonds, and then to donate them to the institution of their choice.

One of Volchek's most vivid memories of the trip "almost like a Fellini movie," she said — took place when the Jordanian ambassador to Israel walked into a Moriah Hotel meeting room filled with Bonds leaders.

Volchek said he stood in front of an Israel Bonds banner and spoke of Jordan and Israel coming together out of a common sense of humanity, not politics.

Samuels told the Montreal group that Yossi Beilin, Israel's deputy foreign minister, "did a lot of damage" to Bonds through his comments last fall that Israel no longer needed the organization.

The Israeli economy may be booming, Volchek said, but Israel has made it clear "that it still needs us."

School funding boosted

Chagnon, who has been education minister for seven months, said many people have worked to bring the matter to this point, among them Rishikof, Rabinovitch and past AJDS president Ralph Lipper. However, he credited Tremblay and Bergman with "pushing it over the top of the mountain."

Tremblay presented Chagnon's move as just the latest in a series of actions the Liberal government has taken in response to the concerns of the Jewish community.

"It shows that Quebec is an open and very generous society, and is recognition, in a very concrete way, of the importance of the Jewish community's contribution to the economic, social and cultural life of Quebec," as well as of the increasing financial burden for families to send their kids to Jewish schools, Tremblay said.

Government funding now covers about half of the total operating costs of the Jewish schools, Rabinovitch said. Most of the rest is covered by fees and fundraising undertaken by the schools. Federation CJA, of which the AJDS is a constituent agency, contributes $1.3 million annually to subsidize students not paying full fees, Rabinovitch said. In addition, Federation CJA provides social and psychological services, and has helped some of the schools with major capital expenditures.

At 100 per cent funding of secular studies, Quebec will become "the only government in North America and perhaps the Western world to fund Jewish schools at this level," he said.

If Quebec goes ahead with transforming the public school system from a denominational to linguistic base, Rabinovitch said that according to his reading of the Education Act the association should be transferrable to any successor board of the MCSC.

In a letter to parents, Rishikof said fees for secular studies, which presently may be up to $750 a year will be reduced by phases, according to the increase in government funding over three years.

"It is important to underline that government grants cover only general studies. The grants do not cover in any way expenses related to your school's Judaica program or building costs."

He stressed that this is conditional upon the AJDS reaching an agreement with a public school board. (He does not specifically mention the MCSC in the letter.)

He added that the AJDS will not enter into any agreement unless it "will guarantee the autonomy, orientation, existing practices, agreements, working conditions of staff, etc., that characterize our schools."

High Holy Day deadlines

During the High Holy Day period, The CJN offices will be closed. The offices will be closed Sept. 15 for Yom Kippur, Sept. 20-21 for Sukkot and Sept. 27-28 for Shemini Atzeret and Simchat Torah. As a result, early deadlines will apply for the issues of Sept. 14, 22, 29 and Oct. 6.

For the issue of Sept. 14, the editorial deadline and organizational advertising deadlines are now past. For classified and display advertising, deadline is Thursday, Sept. 8 at 10 a.m. and 1 p.m. respectively.

For the Oct. 6 issue, editorial deadline is Monday, Sept. 26. Deadline for organization advertising is Sept. 26 at noon. For classified advertising, deadline is Sept. 29 at 10 a.m. Display deadline is Sept. 29 at 1 p.m.

Quebec cemetery named historic site

By DAVID LAZARUS
CJN Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — One of Canada's oldest surviving Jewish cemeteries, the Beth Israel in Quebec City, became the country's second Jewish National Historic Site during a special ceremony August 18.

The event was attended by politicans and invited representatives from the provincial capital's Jewish community, the Historic Sites and Monuments Boards of Canada and Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC).

The dedication and unveiling of an English, French and Hebrew plaque at the 140-year-old cemetery, situated in the suburb of Ste. Foy, was seen as a landmark event in Canadian Jewish history and for the Quebec City Jewish community in particular.

The cemetery was approved as a national historic site for being among "the only extant cemeteries directly associated with more than 230 years of continuous Jewish settlement in Canada" in the view of Jaqueline Hucker, director of Heritage Canada's architectural history branch.

"We are not only here today to confer this important recognition of the Quebec Jewish cemetery," Manuel Shacter, chair of CJC, Quebec region, said in an address to the more than 100 assembled, "but also to pay tribute to the outstanding contribution of the many men and women of the Quebec City Jewish community who have made their mark on both the life of the province of Quebec and that of the entire country."

Canada's other Jewish national historic site is the 130-year-old Congregation Emanue-El, in Victoria, B.C., named in 1983.

During his remarks, Shacter referred especially to the Quebec City's Jewish community's deep roots in the province dating back to the 18th century.

"The ongoing struggle for fundamental rights and freedoms finds important inspiration in the efforts of the Quebec City Jewish community settlers who over two centuries ago acted forcefully in their pursuit of guarantees for civil and political rights within their midst," he said.

In a larger context, said Shacter, the determination of the Quebec City Jewish community to preserve itself and to "educate and sensitize" their fellow citizens to their common Quebec heritage is in keeping with the priority the Jewish community has been placing on fostering rapprochement.

"For us, rapprochement constitutes the development of a better understanding between Jews and French-Canadians," he said.

Among the Quebec City Jewish community figures named by Shacter for their efforts in having the cemetery named a national historic site were Moe Rosenhek, Ena Robinson and Frank Toker.

But the efforts were also known to include such Jewish community figures as Joe Marmur, president of Quebec City's Beth Israel Ohev Shalom Synagogue. Because the Jewish community in Quebec City has been decreasing, a corporation has been formed to keep the cemetery maintained.

Those taking part in the ceremony included Rosenhek, who is president of Quebec City Jewish community's chevra kadisha (burial society); Mount Royal Liberal MP Sheila Finestone, the Secretary of State for Multiculturalism representing Heritage Minister Michel Dupuy; Gilles Lavoie, municipal councillor for Ste. Foy; and Fernard Harvey, member of the Historic Sites and Monuments Board of Canada.

A reception after the dedication took place at the Maurice-Pollack Pavilion at Laval Unversity.

Beilin planning to visit Canada

By MAURICE LUCOW
CJN Western Correspondent

VANCOUVER — Yossi Beilin, the controversial deputy foreign minister of Israel, will be in Canada in October on an official visit.

Beilin will visit Ottawa on Oct. 20 before heading to Vancouver, where he will speak at the Western conference of Canadian Jewish Congress, Pacific region, on the weekend of Oct. 22-23.

Beilin has caused considerable controversy of late with his public statements that Israel should not be treated by the Disapora as a charity case and that funds raised here should not be used to develop programs to ensure Jewish continuity.

He has advocated that the World Zionist Organization and Jewish Agency be abolished and that one worldwide fundraising organization be formed to finance Jewish continuity programming, and to help pay for missions to Israel by young people from the Diaspora.

Beilin is scheduled to speak at the opening of the Western conference Oct. 22, along with Elan Steinberg of the World Jewish Congress and Canadian Jewish Congress president Irving Abella. He will take part in a Sunday forum on Jewish continuity with Steinberg.

B'nai Brith International elects Baer as new president

Jewish Telegraphic Agency

CHICAGO — B'nai Brith International (BBI), the world's oldest and largest Jewish organization, has elected Richmond, Va., attorney Tommy Baer as its new president.

Baer, who was elected at the B'nai Brith biennial convention held here over four days late last month, succeeds Kent Schiner, who concluded his second two-year term of office.

In a much-debated move, the B'nai Brith membership also voted overwhelmingly to reject a motion that would allow non-Jewish spouses of members to become members of the organization, reaffirming a long-standing policy.

Baer's election is regarded as one of the most democratic leadership processes to be found among Jewish organizations.

The campaign closely resembles the American political process, with candidates spending between $10,000 to $35,000 of their own money to finance their efforts.

The two candidates, Baer, 55, and Daniel Thursz, 65, — both longtime leaders of the organization — traveled to the seven B'nai Brith districts in the United States and met with delegates from the 13 foreign districts. They made speeches and presented their platforms, mailed and distributed campaign materials and sought endorsements.

At the convention, the candidates sponsored booths and suites, from which they presented themselves to the different delegate groups in the hopes of swaying last-minute voters.

Six hundred of the 800 B'nai Brith members present at the convention, representing 54 countries, including Canada, voted.

Although it is B'nai Brith's policy not to release the election margins, Sidney Clearfield, the organization's executive vice president, said Baer was elected by a substantial plurality.

He attributed Baer's victory to his emphasis on attracting young blood. B'nai Brith has been beset in recent years with financial problems and an aging membership.

"Tommy Baer was elected with a large constituency from the Young Leadership Division of B'nai Brith, and there is a feeling that he represents a newer generation of leaders," said Clearfield.

"We are expecting his administration to bring in more young leaders and to go forward with the mandate of the B'nai Brith mission," he added.

An attorney, Baer is on the board of the Richmond Jewish Federation's Community Relations Council and serves on the national board of Hebrew Immigrant Aid Society.

Baer also sees his election as representative of the new vision B'nai Brith members have for their organization.

"I feel that my candidacy symbolizes the forward movement of the organization, which is making the necessary changes to adapt to the modern concerns facing B'nai Brith," he said in an interview. "It is a break from the old guard to the new generation of leadership."

Beyond that, Baer said he supports moving B'nai Brith in new directions, including increased dialogue with the black community; more proactive involvement on issues confronting the Jewish community; a greater role in promoting an undivided Jerusalem united under Israeli rule; greater advocacy of the peace process; an increasing membership; an expansion of the organization's youth services; and service in more nations in which there is a Jewish community.

"I am very excited about the possibilities that lie before B'nai Brith as an organization," Baer said. "We are extremely well-equipped to deal with the problems and challenges affecting the Jewish community because we have a constituency in 54 countries around the world, something that makes us unique among Jewish organizations."

Tommy Baer

In a high point of the convention last week, U.S. President Bill Clinton addressed the convention live via satellite from the White House last Wednesday afternoon.

The president thanked B'nai Brith for its "tireless dedication to community service, health education and housing for the elderly and staunch opposition to bigotry of any kind" since its founding in 1843.

He also called for a real, secure and comprehensive peace in the Middle East, "not just the absence of war but a qualitative change in the relations between Israel and its neighbors, full diplomatic ties, an end to the [Arab economic] boycott, open borders for people in trade, joint economic projects."

Clinton also stressed his commitment to bring an end to the Arab boycott of Israel, calling it a "relic of a bygone era" that harms Palestinians as well as Israelis and cannot possibly be justified due to the recent progress made on the Syrian negotiating track.

Clinton said that just as Washington has acted to sustain and enhance Israel's qualitative military edge, "so too, it will help to compensate for any strategic advantages Israel may choose to give up for peace."

With delegates from recently targeted communities in Argentina, Panama and England listening, Clinton pledged his commitment to ending international terrorism.

In response to a question from the president of B'nai B'rith Argentina, the president explained that "we are intensifying our international cooperation, working with Argentina, Great Britain and Panama and other countries to try to help resolve who did these terrible acts of terrorism and apprehend the perpetrators."

"In addition to that, we are increasing our cooperation through intelligence and law enforcement services with countries throughout the globe to try to prevent such acts from occurring in the first place," Clinton said.

Other speakers at the convention included Itamar Rabinovich, Israel's ambassador to the United States, and Abraham Foxman, national director of the Anti-Defamation League.

The Dor L'Dor (Generation to Generation) prize was given to Israeli statesman Abba Eban, opera singer Robert Merrill and author Chaim Potok.

Canadians elected to BBI

CHICAGO — The following Canadians were elected to positions at the recent B'nai Brith International convention held here:

International Treasurer: Harry Bick, Montreal; International Vice-President: Ted Greenfield, Montreal; International Board of Governors: Phil Leon, Hamilton and Moishe Smith, Ottawa.

Five Canadian members of B'nai Brith were cited as among the 150 most outstanding B'nai Brith volunteers in 51 countries: Morris Flicht, Toronto; Ted Greenfield, Montreal; R. Lou Ronson, Toronto; Max Schecter, Toronto and Moishe Smith, Ottawa.

B'nai Brith Canada president Brian Morris led the Canadian delegation to the convention. He was joined by past presidents Gabriel Nachman and Marilyn Frankel, executive vice-president Frank Dimant, Dr. Lawrence Hart, Michael Rosenberg, Lily Rosenberg, Daphne Leon, Phil Leon, Bella Snow, Ralph Snow, Rochelle Wilner, Sid Wilner, Harry Bick, Joyce Bick, Ted Greenfield, Betty Greenfield, Harriet Morris, Morris Flicht, William Morris, Randy Morris, Lou Ronson, Hilde Ronson, Moishe Smith, Carol Smith, Pearl Gladman, Alvin Gorman, Berta Shternberg and Mark Shternberg.

Egyptian minister alters plans; includes visit to Yad Vashem

Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM — Egyptian Foreign Minister Amr Moussa visited Yad Vashem last Wednesday, ending a week-long diplomatic flap.

Moussa arrived at the Holocaust memorial authority for a 20-minute compromise visit, which excluded the usual visit to the museum and wreath-laying ceremony in the Hall of Remembrance.

Last Tuesday, Moussa backtracked on an earlier decision not to include Yad Vashem on his schedule during his two-day official visit.

For many Israelis, Moussa's visit was too little, too late.

The Egyptian minister listened attentively to explanations from Yad Vashem chair Avner Shalev, as he and Israeli Foreign Minister Shimon Peres walked down the Avenue of Righteous Gentiles, past the Warsaw Ghetto Uprising Memorial and the cenotaph to the Six Million.

The party then made its way slowly through the Children's Memorial, the chamber of which is lit only by thousands of dim flickering lights.

Emerging from the memorial, Moussa paused, then wrote in the visitors' book: "This visit brought sad memories of the crimes against fellow human beings based on racial feelings that are abhorrent. I only hope that the future shall never permit that to happen again to any nation, any people ... any children."

Moussa said his visit was so short because of scheduling pressures. "It is a unique place," he said of Yad Vashem.

Earlier, Moussa met at Beit Hanassi with President Ezer Weizman, and said he had invited the president to visit Egypt.

But Weizman reportedly responded that he would be glad to visit after President Hosni Mubarak fixed a date to come to Israel, pointing out that the Egyptian president had been in power 12 years and had never visited the Jewish state.

"He will be my personal guest," Weizman said.

The president, for his part, asked that the Egyptians step up their efforts to find the bodies of Israeli soldiers still missing in action on Egyptian soil.

Supreme Court rules against skinhead

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The Supreme Court of Canada has reinstated the guilty verdict of Paul Wayne Moyer for choreographing a photo shoot in which a skinhead simulated urinating on Jewish graves in a Hamilton cemetery.

"[Moyer's] conduct constituted acts of defilement and callous disrespect towards the remains of the individuals buried under the monuments that feature so prominently in his photographs. Doing what he did with and to the monuments placed on the graves constituted offering indignities to the remains buried below," stated the unanimous 7-0 court decision.

The High Court rejected the majority decision of the Ontario Court of Appeal, which by a 2-1 margin had set aside Moyer's earlier conviction. The Appeal Court majority ruled the Criminal Code section used against Moyer referred to physical contact with human remains and that because there had been no such contact, Moyer was not guilty.

Instead, the Supreme Court cited with approval the dissenting judgment of Justice Marvin Catzman, who had written that "the indignity contemplated by the section [of the Criminal Code] embraces conduct that is dishonorable, disgraceful or unworthy, acts of abuse, defilement or callous disrespect. All of those terms apply to [Moyer's] conduct in the present case as much as they applied to the physical indignities described in reported decisions."

Early in the fall of 1990, Moyer, a former school teacher, approached a young skinhead in the streets of Hamilton. The skinhead had a close-cropped haircut and was wearing Doc Marten boots with white shoelaces, symbolizing a belief in white supremacy.

A week later they drove to the Anshe Shalom cemetery in Hamilton where Moyer photographed the young skinhead. One picture showed the youth standing beyond a gravestone, exposing his penis towards the monument and wearing a T-shirt saying, "F... off and die."

A second picture showed the youth from the upper thigh down, sitting on a gravestone, wearing his boots, holding a Nazi dagger, with a stream of yellow liquid simulating urine pouring down in front of the gravestone.

The third photograph showed a small bird impaled by a Nazi tie pin with a swastika on it lying on a gravestone next to a piece of paper with "Oi! Skins" (a skinhead battlecry) written on it. Moyer had supplied all the props and choreographed the photography.

Jewish groups applauded the reinstatement of the guilty verdict, though they were critical of the light sentence imposed at trial.

"This decision increases our confidence in the justice system's commitment to deal with those individuals who wish to be callously disrespectful to the dead," said Gerda Frieberg, Ontario regional chair of Canadian Jewish Congress.

"As Jewish cemeteries have traditionally been a prime target for anti-Semitic vandalism and other disrespectful acts, this decision sends the message to potential perpetrators that they will not escape the sanctions of our criminal law," she said.

Karen Mock, national director of B'nai Brith's League for Human Rights, said, "We are pleased that the Supreme Court has overturned the decision of the lower court. Moyer's actions were a clear and intentional affront to not only the remains of one individual, but to the Jewish community of Canada as a whole. We welcome this decision as a warning to all racists that their violence and hate will not be tolerated in our legal system."

At trial, Moyer received a suspended sentence and three years probation, which has been reinstated. The Crown prosecutor had recommended a nine-month jail term.

Rwanda field hospital closes up

Jewish Telegraphic Agency

TEL AVIV — The Israeli field hospital set up at the Rwanda-Zaire border to administer emergency medical services to Rwandan refugees returned home last week, after six weeks of harrowing work.

During their stay, three teams of 90 medical and technical volunteers from the Israel Defence Force treated tens of thousands of ailing Rwandans, most suffering from cholera and dehydration, and performed over 100 operations.

IDF Medical Corps officers put the cost of the mercy operation, meant to be a short-term stay, at about $7 million. It is hoped that the Finance Ministry will help defray the costs incurred by the IDF for the mission.

A French hospital is to remain in the area for some time longer to treat remaining Rwandan refugees still in need of medical aid.

In addition, a medical team sent by the American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee remains on the scene and has been left some of the IDF equipment for its 200-bed hospital at the Kibumba refugee camp near the Rwanda-Zaire border.

It is the second medical team sent by the JDC to aid the Rwandan refugees since they began pouring over the border several months ago.

The News in Brief

Rabin's Popularity Plummets

JERUSALEM — An opinion poll published last month showed Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin at his worst popularity rating since he took office in 1992.

The Yediot Aharonot survey put him only one point ahead of Likud leader Benjamin Netanyahu, with 45 per cent saying they would vote for Rabin and 44 per cent for the Likud chief.

The telephone poll, which surveyed 514 Israelis, also showed the Labor Party losing ground to Likud.

Israeli Divorce on Rise

TEL AVIV — Israel's Chief Ashkenazi Rabbi has disclosed that the rate of divorce among Jewish couples in Israel is on the rise.

Rabbi Yisrael Lau told a conference in Jerusalem that "people appear to regard marriage as a revolving door through which they enter and leave with ease, making a mockery of Jewish marriage.

"In 1993, the rate of couples divorcing was a quarter of the number of marriages," he said.

Rabbi Lau said that 5,258 divorces were registered with the chief rabbinate in 1990, and that the numbers rose to 5,692 in 1992 and 6,229 in 1993.

The Clock Strikes...

TEL AVIV — Israelis set their clocks back one hour Aug. 27, reverting to Standard Time while the country was still sweltering under unusually warm days and nights.

The timing of the change from summer to winter time, when the country would normally expect at least a month more of summer weather, has once again heightened tension between the secular majority and the Orthodox minority.

The Orthodox, who represent an estimated 10 per cent of the population, demanded the early changeover to facilitate the recitation of pre-Rosh Hashanah selichot prayers before dawn each day.

According to most accounts, a majority of Israeli Jews prefers the continuation of summer time for at least another month, to coincide with the United States and most of the rest of the world, and provide for reduced electricity costs and more daylight hours.

Readying for Arab Flights

JERUSALEM — Israel's Transport Minister, Yisrael Kessar, has told El Al and Arkia airlines to begin preparing to fly to Arab states.

Speaking at a gathering of directors-general of bodies affiliated with the ministry, Kessar said that in his view, scheduled and charter air routes would open between Ben-Gurion Airport and the Arab capitals within a short time.

Yehoshafat Harkabi Dies

TEL AVIV — Yehoshafat Harkabi, a former intelligence chief of the Israel Defence Force and one of the country's premier specialists on the Arab-Israeli conflict, died of cancer Aug. 26. He was 72.

An acclaimed authority on Middle Eastern affairs and a professor of international relations at the Hebrew University, Harkabi, popularly known by his nickname "Fatti," was adviser to several prime ministers, including Yitzhak Rabin and the late Menachem Begin.

A third-generation Israeli, Harkabi was born in Haifa. He won the prestigious Israel Prize last year for his writings on the Middle East.

Following the 1973 Yom Kippur War, Harkabi turned from hawk to dove, becoming one of the first Israelis to call for negotiations with the PLO and for withdrawal from the territories captured in the 1967 Six-Day War.

Jews Buried in Muslim Grave

AMSTERDAM — An Orthodox Jewish family from Amsterdam, victims of a plane crash in Morocco last month, was buried in a mass grave at a Muslim cemetery in Morocco, despite efforts to have the remains brought to Amsterdam for Jewish burial.

Marius Goldberg, his wife, Eva, their 6-year-old daughter, Nuriel, and 4-year-old son, Emanuel, were interred Aug. 26 with the other 40 victims of the Aug. 21 crash in the Moroccan resort town of Agadir.

Saying it would be impossible to find and identify the remains of the Jewish victims, Moroccan authorities rejected efforts by the Amsterdam chevra kadisha, of which Marius Goldberg was a member, to bring the Goldbergs' remains to Amsterdam. Dutch authorities had also offered to send a special team of identification experts.

Moroccan authorities also cited the need to bury all the dead as quickly as possible because Muslim law, like Jewish law, requires the dead to be buried within 24 hours or as soon as possible after that in cases of emergency.

Swiss Say No To Zhirinovsky

GENEVA — In an unprecedented move, the Swiss government has refused to grant an entry visa to Russian ultranationalist leader Vladimir Zhirinovsky.

Last month, the German Embassy in Moscow refused a visa request for Zhirinovsky to visit Germany.

Zhirinovsky made waves last year by entering Austria and staying at an Alpine resort with a friend who was a former member of the Nazi SS. Several European countries have kicked him out during visits.

Later this month, Switzerland is scheduled to hold a public referendum on whether to enact legislation that will make it a crime to discriminate against ethnic groups or incite racial hatred.

A year ago, Swiss legislators passed the law, but a drive by right-wing groups succeeded in putting the measure to a popular vote, slated for Sept. 25.

Rightist Attacks Bubis

BONN — For the second time this year, the leader of the right-wing Republican Party in Germany has lashed out at Ignatz Bubis, head of Germany's Jewish community, accusing him of instigating racial hatred.

"If Mr. Bubis blames Republican supporters of [being responsible] for petrol bomb attacks, then I shall say today, tomorrow and until the end of my days: Mr. Bubis, this is racist incitement," Franz Schonhuber said at a recent election rally in the Bavarian town of Hopfenau.

Similar remarks by Schonhuber at his party's convention last spring triggered angry reactions throughout Germany, with many demanding that Schonhuber's party be outlawed.

At that time, Bubis had stated that all of Germany's right-wing extremist groups were collectively responsible for the firebombing in late March of a synagogue in the northern port town of Lubeck.

Schonhuber, a former member of the SS, retorted that fault for the firebombing lay with Bubis, a Holocaust survivor, whom Schonhuber described as one of the country's "worst agitators." He added that the Jewish leader "was responsible for anti-Semitism in Germany."

So far, no legal measures have been taken against the Republicans. But the Interior Ministry announced last month it would put the party under "close watch," following its recent announcement that it would seek an alliance with the neo-Nazi German People's Union party.

Young Vandals Released

BONN — Three youths who overturned some 15 tombstones at a Jewish cemetery in the Thuringian town of Muhlhausen recently were released after local police determined that alcohol, not neo-Nazi ideology, had motivated them.

Police who arrested the three teenagers said the young vandals were released because they had "had no political motives" and were "not neo-Nazis."

A police official said the youths, aged 14, 15 and 16, had been drinking and were trying to show off.

Police left it up to a local prosecutor to decide whether to charge them.

Anti-Israel Measure Defeated

GENEVA — The United Nations Human Rights Commission has passed a resolution praising progress in the Middle East peace process and calling on all UN member states to extend economic assistance to the three-month-old Palestinian governing authority.

At the same time, the 53-member commission rejected a second resolution that condemned Israel for committing human rights abuses in the territories.

It marked the first time since 1968 that Israel was not condemned for its practices in the territories.

The second resolution had been sponsored by Syria, Lebanon and Cuba.

Spielberg Donates Profits

LOS ANGELES — All of Steven Spielberg's personal profits from his Academy Award-winning film Schindler's List will go to the newly established Righteous Persons Foundation.

No formal announcement will be made until Oct. 1, when the foundation's director, Margery Tabankin, will begin her job.

Tabankin is the longtime head of the Hollywood Women's Political Committee and served as director of Volunteers in Service to America during the Jimmy Carter administration.

The foundation's endowment has not been determined and their have been no comments on a rumored figure of $25 million.

One focus of the foundation will be Holocaust education, although its scope is expected to extend to other Jewish causes.

THE MIRACLE CONTINUES...

Since 1990, over 500,000 Jews have been brought to new lives of freedom in Israel. By the year 5760, another 500,000 will arrive. Thank you for being a part of it. And, for the 5,755th time, Shana Tovah.

Yom Kippur

By RABBI AARON LEVINE

"And it was evening and it was morning, one day." (Genesis 1:5) On this the Midrash comments — "Yom echad, one day — the one [special] day that the Almighty gave to them [the Jewish nation]. Which day is this? This is the day of Yom Kippur." (Breishis Rabbah 3:8).

The Talmud tells us that repentance was among the seven things that were created before the world was created. (Nedarim 39b.) The Talmud also tells us (Yerushalmi Makkos 2:6), that logically speaking, when a man or woman sins, there should be no way of removing that sin.

If business is going bad and the books show a deficit you can't simply scrap the books and start all over again — customers, suppliers, and debtors don't usually allow for such a simple alternative. If you are a hardened criminal finally caught by the law, you won't be able to merely tell the judge, "Your honor, I'm really sorry. I promise to turn over a new leaf. May I please go now?"

Only the Almighty, Creator of all, can decree in His wisdom that the world can integrate teshuvah (repentance), into the fabric of creation. And more, He realized that the world couldn't exist unless the mechanisms enabling one to do teshuvah were put in place even before the universe was created.

It is the greatest kindness that one can bestow upon another, the blessing of forgiveness — it is even a greater kindness from the Almighty — Who allows us each year to remove our shabby garments and negotiate a new chance and a fresh start, especially when the stakes are so high — life itself, health and sickness, wealth or poverty, livelihood or a struggle to financially survive, contentment or unrest, naches or aggravation from our children, marital harmony or strife — all of the blessings or their opposite, in the myriads of ways that they affect our lives.

It is true that each day we ask, "Bring us back, O our Father, to Your Torah, and bring us near, O our King, to Your service, and return us before You in perfect repentance. Blessed are You, HaShem, Who desires repentance./ Forgive us, O our Father, for we have erred; pardon us O our King, for we have willfully sinned; for You pardon and forgive. Blessed are You HaShem, the gracious One Who pardons abundantly." (Daily Shemoneh Esrei Prayer.)

But although teshuvah is accepted each day, the day of Yom Kippur is that one special day of the year that was created for repentance and forgiveness.

It is not always easy to recognize what our purpose is in the world. It is not always easy to understand how we fall short of our obligations for which we were created. And even if we are privileged to realize both of the above, it is not always easy to repent sincerely. Not because we do not want to admit that we have sinned, but because of the fact that we despair of ever being able to rise above the baseness of our emotions and desires. What's the use, I will sin all over again.

But we must never fall into that trap. If we wish to sincerely return to God and His Torah and mitzvot, He will extend special siyata dishmaya (Heavenly assistance), especially on the day of Yom Kippur.

It is therefore imperative that we recognize the golden opportunities that this day provides, and that we ensure that we properly utilize the precious 24 hours of this incredible creation of time.

Rabbi Simcha Zisel Ziev of Kelm gave us the following parable which will help us understand the potential power of teshuvah and what can be accomplished on the day of Yom Kippur.

There was once a king who promised a large reward to anyone who could scale an enormously high ladder that had one hundred widely spaced rungs.

Hearing of the great reward, and believing that the task could not be that formidable, many people rushed to the scene of the ladder, hoping to claim the prize. But as soon as they actually saw the enormity of the ladder, they left without even attempting to climb it. It was obviously an impossibility and the king was merely teasing or mocking his subjects.

One by one they left the site of the ladder — only one man remained. He, too, thought it looked impossible to climb the ladder. But he knew the king. He was neither a fool nor a sadist. He would not mock his subjects and make sport of them in such a cruel fashion. If the king offered the challenge then it must be possible to achieve. And if it was possible, then he was certainly going to make every effort to conquer the climb.

The others who had heard of his willingness to attempt the climb hurried back to watch the spectacle. They laughed at him and taunted him. How foolish he was to attempt the impossible. Didn't he realize that he was doomed to climb a few rungs and then fall off, exhausted and humiliated? If it was possible don't you think they wanted the great reward as much as he did?

But the believer was not to be deterred — he began to climb. By the fifth rung his strength was already giving out. By the seventh, which he reached with incredible effort, his legs were like lead. By the eighth — his lungs were bursting. Ninth, which he reached only with superhuman effort — total exhaustion. That was it. They were right. It was impossible. Ninety-one more rungs to go. He couldn't even make 10th!

But it must be possible otherwise the king would not have made the challenge. He focused all of his mental faculties, summoned up all his powers of determination — and struggled up one more rung.

Then, just as he was about to collapse and fall from the ladder, he felt himself being lifted, as if by a huge magnet, and soon found himself on the 100th rung — the very top of the ladder. He had succeeded, without knowing how it could be done, simply because he had trusted the king and had faith that the challenge was real and not a mockery.

Indeed, the royal wish was not that the entire ladder be scaled — that was truly humanly impossible. What the king wanted was that people should dedicate themselves totally to reaching the limits of their ability — more was not required; the king would do the rest.

In more modern terms — we all know that it takes tremendous power to launch a rocket. But once the thrust has been successful and the rocket reaches orbit, it then moves on almost effortlessly.

So it is with us. We have a saying, "Es iz shver tzu zein a Yid — it is difficult to be a good Jew." The truth is that perhaps the beginning is difficult and requires a lot of effort. But once one has learned to understand that there is a God; that He gave us a Torah which He wants us to observe; that He commanded mitzvot which are the practical instructions of His divine manual — the rest of the climb is not that difficult.

In the spiritual quest that God has set for mankind, it is true that it seems that He wants us to scale a ladder that is impossible to climb. But He does not expect us to do it alone. He asks only that we make a sincere and diligent effort. Once we do that we earn and merit His divine assistance. And the goal of success is readily attainable.

Two of the greatest deterrents to a lifestyle of complete Torah observance are one, a lack of knowledge and understanding of what HaShem and His Torah are all about; two, the pursuit of the physical, the desire to focus on the body rather than the neshamah, the soul.

On Yom Kippur, we are freed for 24 hours from the worry of providing nourishment in any form for our bodies; we are elevated in spirit to be like the angels. This is the time to make the sincere attempt to simultaneously elevate our understanding of HaShem and His holy Torah — to resolve to come closer, to rededicate and recommit ourselves to the quest of ascending the spiritual ladder — a ladder which, as in Jacob's dream, has its feet firmly planted on earth though its rungs reached the very heavens.

We, too, as mortals, can still live on this earth, but our goal should be to climb this ladder of spirituality which our King has challenged us to conquer! May this day bring us one more rung closer to the 10th rung! Amen.

Sonderkommano uprising to be marked

TORONTO — Jewish delegations from Canada, the United States and Israel will be in Poland Oct. 7 for special ceremonies at Auschwitz to commemorate the 50th anniversary of the Sonderkommando uprising.

There will be an unveiling of a memorial plaque at Block 27 of the former Nazi death camp to honor the four young women who smuggled in gunpowder for the uprising of the Sonderkommano (crematoria workers), said Nathan Leipciger, a survivor of Auschwitz-Birkenau and chair of the Canadian Jewish Congress national Holocaust remembrance committee.

Ala Gertner, Roza Robota, Regina Safirzslajn and Ester Wajcblum were identified as participants in the smuggling operation, which resulted in the destruction of gas chambers and Crematorium No. 4. Although brutally tortured during interrogation they did not betray any of their comrades. They were publicly hanged on Jan. 5, 1945, less than two weeks before the evacuation of Auschwitz-Birkenau.

Among those planning to attend the ceremony is Anna Heilman of Ottawa, the coordinator of the Committee of the Auschwitz "Union" Survivors. She was among those who helped smuggle gunpowder into Auschwitz-Birkenau. Her sister was Ester Wajcblum.

Those wishing to participate in this program can contact Heilman at (613) 225-1293 or Allan Mallenbaum of the Rosa Robota Foundation at (516) 349-0425, who is coordinating a complete tour departing from New York's JFK International Aiport Oct. 3.

Front Line

Holy days seen through the eyes of a cynical believer

By SHARON CLARK

Who hasn't felt a tinge of irony over the High Holidays, a wave of hypocrisy, amusement, indulgence and embarrassment?

We don our best clothes and head — in our cars — to shul, while the rest of the world continues its daily routine. There is almost a feeling of floating above it all, somewhere in a golden, better existence, holier and more special. We smile in our secret superiority.

Quietly, a smile fixed on my face in case I see an old friend or acquaintance, I follow my mother quickly to our seats. Her seat, really. I haven't bought one because I'm still a "student" (although I finished my master's degree three years ago), and do not yet need to be an upstanding member of the community. You don't have to be upstanding (or rich enough to afford your own shul membership) until you're married, or so they say. I'll see how long I can put it off. Meanwhile, I'll grab someone else's seat until they show up.

We open our machzorim. My mother searches carefully for the right passage. I look over at my neighbor and check the page number. Once I'm in my seat and on the right page, I can let my mind start to wander. Here I am again. The same place I was last year at this time. One year older, wiser. How has the year been? What were the biggest events? Am I happier now, or was I happier then? What about the rest of my family? Where are they, anyway? Are they thinking about me?

Hold on. Here comes one of the Greatest Hits: "Kadosh kadosh kadosh . . ." Holy holy holy. God of armies. We do say some strange things when we pray, but it doesn't matter because most of us don't understand what we're saying. It is a foreign language after all.

We're standing up now. Watch for lower back pain caused by poor posture and unsensible heels. (Is my hem straight? I really do like this skirt. I hope no one remembers it from last year.) It's the Amidah, which means, literally, the Standing. Now is when I speed read in a fluent mumble, singing the tune I learned in early childhood at Jewish day school . . .

"Please turn to page 347 for the repetition of the Amidah . . .Baruch atah . . ."

What was I saying? Praying really makes you hungry. People are starting to get restless. I catch one lady's eye and she gives me a knowing smile under her dashing felt hat. I'm not sure what it is we both know, but I smile back. Actually, there are quite a few dashing felt hats in a variety of fall fashion hues. Suede shoes too. I wonder if there is a store at the mall called Esther's Rosh Hashanah Boutique that sells matching felt hats and suede shoes . . .

My eyes drift to the pulpit and the rabbi, and then instinctively to my machzor. I realize I'm two pages behind. "On Rosh Hashanah it will be written, and on Yom Kippur it will be sealed: who shall be born; who shall pass on; who shall die by strangling and who by stoning; who shall go crazy and who shall be left in peace . . . But repentance, prayer and charity avert the severity of decree." We still get what's coming to us, but the blow is cushioned because we're here today. The blow is cushioned because we blow the shofar.

"Sharon, remind me to bring the cake this afternoon," my mother cuts into my thoughts. I nod.

Does our sitting and standing with an open book in our hands in a room full of done-up versions of "our kind," all facing the same direction, really make a difference in our future? We can't be certain. But on the off chance that it does, we should probably pray, as a community. Just in case there is a God. Just in case he hears us. Just in case he looks beyond the felt hats, the suede shoes, and the respective career paths of the up-and-coming and soon-to-be upstanding young people in the congregation and sees our bared souls, our moral integrity (or lack thereof), our love for our families, our hope that the year will go well and will not hold tragedy or upheaval, our belief that somewhere we will find the strength to get through, that there is a reason for us being here. Just in case.

"Aleinu l'shabayach . . . sh'lo asanu kegoyei ha'artzot." Let us give praise to God, ruler of the universe . . . who did not make us like other nations . . ." This is number one in the High Holiday Hit Parade. We all sing, and even bow at the right time. Such cohesiveness makes everyone smile, especially since we know we're near the end. Those who understand what the prayer means smile ironically. We say we're not like other people. Well, we're not. Look at us, in prayer shawls and skullcaps and doilies for the married women, singing in a languge we ignore 362 days a year.

Shanah Tovah. Now let's eat.

Rewriting history is immoral and dangerous

By RABBI ROBERT WOLKOFF

There is probably no principle more widely held by the Jewish community than the principle that any attempt to rewrite history is immoral. And dangerous.

Thus the justifiable indignation when Louis Farrakhan distorts the history of Jews and blacks, when Holocaust deniers utter their obscenities, when haters of Israel twist the historical record.

But Jews, too, sometimes betray this principle. We seem to forget that any attempt to rewrite history is immoral. And dangerous. Certainly it is inappropriate to distort the past for the sake of the present. But it is also inappropriate — immoral and dangerous — to distort the present for the sake of the past. And this nearly always happens when the topic of modern Germany arises.

We seem to have trouble distinguishing between "them" then and "them" now. They are not the same. Not even remotely close. And thus, when skinheads attack immigrants, it is a distortion of history to say, "Germans have learned nothing."

Hundreds of thousands of Germans — politicians, academics, clergy (the same professional groups most dedicated to Hitler) — protest against racism and demand justice. They have, indeed, learned. To ignore that, to however vaguely hint that deep down today's Germans are Nazis, is immoral and dangerous. Not only does it demean and dehumanize living human beings, it obfuscates the horriying reality of what the Nazis truly were — a reality which for the world's sake must be understood with crystal clarity.

Several years ago, in the midst of the racist riots, a political cartoon showed two men looking upon Germany. One praised the advanced German society, and said, "What more could you ask?" The other responded, "That they read The Diary of Anne Frank."

As if "they" don't, more than any people in the world. As if "they" need it more than anyone else.

These issues are current now because of a Library of Congress exhibition, assembled by the German government, entitled Against Hitler: German Resistance to National Socialism, 1933-1945. According to Marc Fisher, writing in the Washington Post, there are accusations that the German government is "intent on rewriting the past." When, in point of fact, the rewrite seems to be in the other direction: There is an attempt to erase the significance of German resistance, as if a few points of light could somehow eradicate the infinite darkness.

Is it fair, is it moral, to insist that the White Rose student protesters, von Stauffenberg and his co-conspirators, and thousands of nameless politicians, workers, and "little people" who stood up, in ways great and small, against the Nazis — is it fair to insist that these people never be raised above the status of a footnote?

Yes, it is true that it was too little, too late — and too few. Yes, it is true that it was mere thousands compared to millions. Yes, it is true that even the good were less than pristine. There is much that argues for the footnote.

But there is another side. Many of these people gave their lives in the struggle against Hitler. Is their memory never to be allowed a moment in the sun? Should not the German people of today be allowed to build their future on the values they so courageously embodied?

Without doubt, this is a moral minefield. But when Sybil Milton, senior historian at the Holocaust Museum, received "thunderous applause," according to Fisher's report, for claiming at an exhibition seminar that German resistance had been "exploited" in order to blur history, a moral boundary was crossed.

"There were a few Germans with some courage. You're taking the exception and making it the rule," she claimed. "Where is the context?"

"The rule"? Do any German scholars, German government officials, or man-on-the-street-Germans (outside of radical fringe groups) seriously maintain the proposition that resistance to Hitler was "the rule"? None that I have ever heard of.

And is there any German who is unaware of the "the context?"

It is obviously a lie to claim that all Germans except Hitler were 11 years old during the war. But it is also a distortion of history to forget that not one person in today's Germany younger than age 60 could have participated in the war. And these millions of people — innocent people, decent people (at least as decent as anyone else) — have the same right as all other people to build an image of themselves based on their heroes.

To do that, of course, requires knowing who the enemy was the heroes fought against. No one, except Jews, knows that better than the Germans themselves. Several years ago, I spoke at a conference in Germany. There I heard a high school student describe his class history project. Each student was to pick a Jewish family and trace its history. What they did, where they lived — and what happened to them.

As he was speaking, I thought about the insipid project that I did in my history class. It was something about a local Indian tribe. I wrote about how they had lived, but somehow I never got around to asking why they weren't around any more.

The word genocide didn't appear in my term paper.

There are reasons to admire, and to pity, that young student, and the millions of his compatriots, who are forced to ask the terrible questions. It is beneath our dignity to denigrate them as if the Germans as a whole are a nation of murderers. Germany was a nation that once was ruled by murderers. Once, but no longer. To pretend otherwise is to rewrite history.

And any attempt to rewrite history is immoral. And dangerous.

Why 'political therapy' is necessary in the '90s

By ARNOLD AGES

The first four years of the 1990s have been devoted to parsing the intricacies of political correctness. The next six will be preoccupied with another political phenomenon — this time, political theraphy.

Shifts in the major political spheres of the world are necessitating a re-examination of the views we have lived with so comfortably since the end of World War II. To adjust to the way national reputations have been laundered so quickly and thoroughly requires a healthy dollop of political therapy.

Here are some of the reasons why reasonable people above age 50, especially those with some sense of history and politics, need that political therapy.

For 70 years the atheist Soviet Union was, in our eyes, the incarnation of absolute evil and a menacing military colossus. The horrors of the Gulag seemed to prove this view right.

Today the Soviet Union no longer exists and Russia, the successor state, sees religion flourishing as it strives to raise itself from an international economic basket case to the level of a Third World country. Its once powerful army has been virtually neutered.

From 1945 and the Iron Curtain, communist hegemony ruled Eastern Europe with totalitarian cruelty. In the last decade, former satellite states of the Soviet Union, having thrown off the yoke of the oppressor, now plot their own national destinies and invite western money and expertise.

Unfortunately, ethnic and religious rivalries, mute under repressive rule, have emerged with satanic vigor as Christians and Muslims go at each other with a zeal that recalls medieval crusades.

Arnold Ages

Yugoslavia, the rare exception in the satellite community because of Tito's image and partisan record in the war against Hitler, was always celebrated in the West for its independent-minded government and quasi-rational political system.

Today this "model" has been rent with internecine strife and atrocities not seen since Nazism. It took the Serbs, the victims of Croat incivilities in World War II, to reinvent the concentration camp in the 1990s.

South Africa, since the beginning of this century the devil's own experiment on earth, was the lightning rod for well-deserved condemnation of its immoral apartheid system, the mechanism which disenfranchised and exploited the majority of blacks for the benefit of the "white tribe."

Today, in a bewildering and sudden transformation, a black man now rules South Africa following a democratic election. Whites and blacks are working towards an amicable condominium arrangement.

Japan lost the Pacific war in 1945: its cities were flattened and its economic infrastructure sundered. Millions of its soldiers were killed in its vain attempt to spread its "Greater East Asia Co-Economic Prosperity Sphere," the propagandistic term dreamed up in 1943 by the Japanese imperial bureaucrats.

Today the Japanese phoenix has risen to unimagined heights and its prosperity sphere, along with its heavy yen, are threatening the economic health of the United States, the country that defeated it so decisively 53 years ago.

Germany, the country that gave the world blitzkreig, panzer and Auschwitz and which inflicted 20 million casualties on the Soviet Union alone during World War II, has rehabilitated both its reputation and the economic strength for which it was once pre-eminent.

Perhaps the greatest need for the application of political therapy is in the domain of the Arab-Israeli conflict. People accustomed to viewing Arab and Palestinian leaders through the filter of negative stereotypes now have to adjust their lenses in order to accommodate developments such as the following.

The PLO, since 1964, has been Israel's constant irritant and most implacable enemy. Its cadres were regularly anathematized by successive Israeli governments — whose prime ministers, including the incumbent, regularly promised never to speak with or recognize the PLO.

Today, in the wake of the PLO-Israel accords, Yasser Arafat presides over a nascent Palestinian state in Gaza and Jericho — with the approval, if not the blessing, of the Israel authorities.

King Hussein, whose citizens in Jordan obscenely cheered Saddam Hussein's Scud missiles on their way to wreck havoc in Israel three years ago, has become a mensch and the borders of his country are for the first time open to tourists coming through Israel.

Hafez al-Assad, the Syrian president who rules over a nation once referred to by the late Richard Nixon as a group of "crazies," and who has been adamant in his opposition to Israel, has now apparently had some second thoughts about the Golan Heights and may agree to talks before Israel hands over those majestic mountain ranges.

It is obvious that the modern world is undergoing political seismic shifts of such magnitude that only continual political therapy can assist us in coping with the transformation of enemy into friend, adversary into comrade. The exercise is hard on the nerves because it requires a major rewiring of our prejudices and misconceptions and a broadening of our neural networks. Political therapy will help ease us into the hardest exercise which the human being confronts in life: changing one's mind.

It is also a powerful antidote to the rigidity of our current tracking of perceived foes.

The Jews of Lodz

In the last week of August a Jewish presence was felt once again on the streets of Lodz, Poland, as 200 former ghetto dwellers of that city reassembled to see each other and commemorate the events that sealed their fate 50 years ago.

Then 220,000 of their comrades were crowded into a pestilential ghetto, there to await transport to Auschwitz and their inevitable death in the gas chambers. By war's end only a tiny number of Jews remained in what had been Poland's second largest agglomeration of Jews.

According to David Margolick, writing in The New York Times (August 26), there was always something special about the Jews of Lodz. Second only in number to those of Warsaw, they represented a third of the entire population of the city of Lodz and from them came people like pianist Arthur Rubinstein.

The 200 survivors who returned to Lodz were flooded with bitter memories of a time when the world went mad, memories which were reinforced by the fact that Lodz, unlike Warsaw, was largely spared the physical devastation that the Polish capital experienced under the Nazis.

The Lodz survivors from Sweden, Israel, England and the United States were able to see, among other things, the former headquarters of the Nazis and the offices where Judenrat leader Chaim Rumkowski once compiled lists of Jews to be sent on their last journey.

They also saw another remarkable thing during their visit — a small but vigorous renewed Jewish presence in the city. Lodz now has a new Jewish youth centre, and a small but growing band of young Jewish people, some of whom have only recently discovered their Jewish origins.

During the recent assembly of Lodz Jews, the civic officials went out of their way to welcome the visitors. They have taken steps to restore Jewish properties and fight Holocaust revisionism. They arranged entertainment for the visitors by a klezmer band from Krakow. Worship services were also held in Lodz's newly restored synagogue.

We may hope that the Lodz commemoration signals a new era in the tangled relationships between Poland and the Jewish people. Whether or not that proves to be the case, it was an important act of memory through which some of the martyred Jewish millions can be summoned up, however imperfectly, in the minds of the survivors — so that the victims will not be forgotten.

Iraq's overtures

Iraq has apparently expressed interest in, and support for, the current peace process in the Middle East. Recent reports suggest that an Iraqi diplomat approached Gad Ya'acobi, Israel's ambassador at the United Nations, and that a group of Iraqi businessmen with ties to Iraq's strongman Saddam Hussein met with Uri Lubrani, the Israeli official in charge of coordinating Israel's policy in southern Lebanon.

It doesn't take a genius to understand why Iraq — which rained Scud missiles on Israel only three years ago and is still in the vanguard of the Arab rejectionist front — is suddenly turning dovish.

Suffocated by a United Nations embargo which is throttling the life out of its economy, Iraq is desperately seeking a way out of its self-inflicted travails. The sanctions were imposed shortly after Iraq invaded and annexed Kuwait in August 1990. They will not be lifted until Iraq complies with all UN resolutions, which are basically designed to prevent Iraq from rebuilding a war machine formidable enough to threaten regional stability once again.

In accordance with its transparent Machiavellian principles, Iraq apparently believes it can break the embargo by improving relations with Israel and thus currying favor with the United States, the chief enforcer of the sanctions. It is a ploy that will not work, and Israel was right to reject Iraq's overtures. There is no concrete evidence whatsoever that Iraq has sincerely altered its essentially hostile attitude toward Israel. And as long as Iraq is not in full compliace with UN resolutions, Israel would have nothing to gain by dealing with Saddam Hussein's regime.

Moreover, Iraq has tried this trick before. In the early 1980s, when the Iran-Iraq War was not going well for Baghdad, Saddam Hussein told a visiting American congressman from Brooklyn, Stephen Solarz, that he was not averse to an Arab-Israeli settlement which guaranteed Israel's existence. Within several years, following the end of that war, Iraq disavowed its supposedly good intentions.

It is in Israel's strategic interest to expand the arc of peace in the Middle East, and since Iraq has been and will be a regional power, Baghdad should eventually be included in that equation. But Iraq's participation should be contingent on its unequivocal fulfillment of UN resolutions and its unambiguous acceptance of Israel as a member of the family of nations in the Middle East.

HOW IT WAS DONE

The heart-rending story of the imprisonment of the Swed brothers in Syria ("Swed brothers flee Syria after years of prison brutality," CJN August 25) omitted one very important fact.

During their incarceration and later, it was the money which came from so many contributors to the Dr. Ronald Feld Fund for Jews in Arab Lands at the Beth Tzedec Congregation, Toronto, which provided essential food, medication, support for their family, legal representation for what turned out to be a mockery of a "trial," and ultimately the cost of the necessary exit permits and airline tickets to leave the country.

The Swed brothers, like so many others who have been able to leave Syria, were the beneficiaries of the generosity of the Canadian Jewish community.

WALDHEIM'S KNIGHTHOOD

I was shocked and terribly disturbed to learn about the bestowal of "knighthood," by the Pope, upon a Nazi officer suspected of war crimes.

Since 1987, Kurt Waldheim has been barred from entering the U.S.A., because of his "wartime contributions." Indeed, many medals of honor were bestowed upon him by the Nazis for his assistance to their cause.

Does the Pope really think that his actions can overturn and in fact, absolve his past? A more blatant mockery of truth and justice could never be concocted!

Where is the "conscience" of the Catholic Church?

GENEALOGY THANKS

Thank you for the wonderful article on our cemetery project that appeared in the August 18 edition of The CJN. I have only one small correction. I took the photographs that accompanied the article but the gentleman shown is actually Henry Wellisch, the president of the Jewish Genealogical Society of Canada.

ISRAEL AND IRAQ DIFFER

The fact that Canada's Immigration and Refugee Board (CIRB) is being duped by false refugee claimants from Israel and the former Soviet Union is in itself not surprising. While applauding Canada's place as a country with compassion and a regard for the oppressed, some of the decisions of the Board border on the absurd .

What is most troubling about the CIRB and by extension some federally appointed judges who have upheld the Board's rulings is the obvious ignorance of the fact that Israel is a flourishing democracy that does not create refugees. Israel is blessed with a sophisticated legal system; it has an ombudsman and human rights commissions that are on a parallel with any of the recognized democracies in the world. For members of the CIRB and certain Federal Court judges not to know that is a reflection on them as presumably informed individuals who know the difference between Israel and Iraq.

It is incumbent upon the federal goverment to issue some information packets to the CIRB so that their members will recognize the distinction between a country with functioning democratic institutions and one that promotes state sponsored persecution. If that is too sophisticated for Immigration Minister Sergio Marchi to understand then perhaps he should be provided with a simple map of the world designating the good guys from the bad guys.

ALERT ON NEO-NAZIS

Thank you for the coverage regarding the Nationalist Party's approach to municipalities to proclaim European Heritage Week.

As the only Jewish councillor on Winnipeg's City Council I was approached by a local newspaper on my views. I was horrified that an organization with known linkages to neo-Nazi activities was applying for a proclamation from several Canadian cities.

As a member of the National Race Relations Committee and the City of Winnipeg's Race Relations, I am familiar with the Nationalist Party and its neo-Nazi activities. I was appalled to hear that some cities had issued a proclamation.

The infiltration by such groups into mainstream Canada to promote activities proclaimed by various cities demonstrates how vulnerable we are and how dangerous such endorsements can be,

The Race Relations Office of the Canadian Federation of Municipalities has provided lists of neo-Nazi groups to several cities. Obviously that is not enough. I urge national organizations to forward to all mayors' offices in their respective provinces a list of neo-Nazi groups for them not to sponsor or endorse, nor to support any activities associated with these operations.

MA'AVAR'S ROLE

Re: Young Reform Jews launch new group (CJN July 21)

On behalf of the members of Temple Har Zion's Ma'avar, we want to congratulate Tamara Fisher and Andrew Consky on creating a new Reform young people's group. We hope that having many such groups will provide young Jews with a place of their own in the community.

However, we would like to clarify several things stated in the article. Ma'avar is not "Temple Har Zion's youth group." Our youth groups are JHAZY and MHARZY, and they are both extremely vibrant, exciting groups of their own accord.

Ma'avar is a group of people from the age of 19 to mid-30s who are interested in getting together for social, educational, religious, and cultural programs. Ma'avar is a vital member of the Temple Har Zion community — we run the Selichot barbecue, the Yom Kippur afternoon service, and the Purim carnival, and have members sitting on every Temple committee.

We cannot, of course, be all things to all people — we simply strive to provide the programming, involvement, and community that our members seek. We hope this newly created group will be able to do the same for its members.

To fast or not to fast — there is no question

By RABBI W. GUNTHER PLAUT

During the dog-days of August we have been cleaning out old cupboards and and file cabinets. A yellowed piece of paper came to hand, a newspaper article I had written many years ago. Entitled Day of Retreat, it was published on Oct. 1, 1968.

Its first sentence read:

"Tomorrow, while the government of Quebec appoints a new premier and in St. Louis the World Series gets underway, there will be a quarter of a million people in Canada who, though concerned with either or both of these, will have a previous commitment. They will be in retreat. For tomorrow is the one day on which most or all Jews, whether religious or non-religious, give expression to some sense of selfness."

The day to which I referred was, of course, Yom Kippur, and at least half of the introductory sentence struck me as amusingly coincidental. While certainly this year there will be no World Series played on Yom Kippur, the people of Quebec will once again choose a new premier that very week. Besides, the verities of the Holy Day have remained the same.

Rabbi Plaut

Come Yom Kippur, the observant will spend as much time as they can in the synagogue, the non-observant will pay at least a brief visit to where Dad or Grandpa worship, or perhaps drop in during the afternoon hour when the prayers for the dead are said.

There are of course those Jews who are done with all religious forms, but even they will likely feel the pull of the day and stay away from work — a kind of declaration of historic solidarity.

Our very prayers reveal this, for there are very few of them that speak of "I"; rather, the machzor phrases them in the plural. To say "we" is an essential aspect of our identity. Being a Jew means to be part of a community and share in its resonsibilities.

And then, the fast. In a strange way it is the abstinence from food that unites all observances; it is the rare self-denial that forms the background against which the prayers, the songs, and the remembrances are expressed.

All this is sanctified by age; but now something new has been added. A pill, when taken before Yom Kippur is said to "overwhelmingly relieve the symptoms of fasting." Manufactured in Jerusalem, it has caught on in Great Britain, and its catchy title is Easy Fast. It costs 6 pounds a bottle; the ingredients remain a mystery, doctors are sceptical, and the supply was sold out at once.

I am not much of a pill taker and this one too has no appeal for me. For though it may help people to observe the commandment in form, it robs fasting of one of its important aspects. The Torah says that we are to "afflict" ourselves. Yom Kippur is to encourage the soul to gain ascendancy over the body. We always are in the habit of satisfying our physical needs first and our spiritual needs come lagging behind. Fasting with the use of a pill that makes one forget self-denial is like blowing a trumpet instead of a shofar. One is highly musical with clear and rounded tones, the other brings forth a series of raw and biting sounds. Yom Kippur features the latter, not the former. So let the fast bother you a little, it is good for the soul.

A 'righteous gentile' cares for graves of Vienna Jews

By DAVID BIRNBAUM

In August 1993, I was in Vienna looking for the graves of some of my relatives. My wife and I had only a brief time to spend in Vienna when we turned up unannounced one Friday morning at the main gate of the general section of the Zental Friedhop municipal cemetery.

There are 60,000 Jewish graves in the two Jewish sections of the cemetery: the older section entered from Gate No. 1, and the "newer," still current section entered from Gate 4. The Jewish cemetery is very big, as it once served a large Jewish population that then shrunk to a fraction of its former size prior to World War II and now cannot afford the upkeep. Indeed, few of the Jews in Vienna have family connections with those buried there.

Austria was incorporated into Nazi Germany in 1938. Most of the area devoted to Jewish burial (particularly the older section) became, through neglect, a literal jungle with great numbers of big trees and impenetrable undergrowth. On top of this, Allied bombs, which had missed nearby strategic targets during the war, destroyed parts of the cemetery. Yet within about 40 minutes of our first enquiry we were standing at the graves of some of my ancestors. How did we manage this?

Somebody at the general enquiry office suggested we see Magister Walter Pagler at Gate No. 1. This man, who is not a Jew, has at great cost to his livelihood and his private life devoted himself for some years to putting the neglected parts of the Jewish cemetery to rights. He has now taken two years off from his law practice and set up two portable cabins at the entrance to the older section of the Jewish cemetery, where he can be found almost every day overseeing the work, as well as helping people looking for family tombstones.

His interest in the project began with a news report of an anti-Semitic desecration

The task has been, and continues to be, enormous. Some of the work can only be done with heavy equipment, but other sections must be cleared by hand to preserve the graves and gravestones. Pagler has enlisted the help of university students, local school children and even the army. The educational value for these helpers, particularly in view of the Nazi past, should not be underestimated, and of course Pagler is aware of this. I asked him if he had run into much opposition from the neo-Nazis. "I had much more trouble from the Greens, who wanted to save the trees," he said. "I said to them, 'You don't seem to understand, this is a Jewish cemetery.' " His work depends on volunteer helpers and donations to survive.

His interest in the project began with a news report of desecration and destruction in the Jewish cemetery. He and a few others set up a group, which they named Schalom, to do something about it. They felt outraged by the desecrations, particularly in view of what had happened 50 years ago to the Jews. Things grew from there.

Pagler has entered in his Macintosh computer all the records he has been able to find. (He has had requests from Israelis for the information, but says it would be impracticable for him to print out the 900 pages.) The computer lists the name, home address, place of death and location of each grave by block, row and number.

Armed with a map that he gave us, it all seemed quite simple. But it wasn't. Even after the clean-up, it was still very confusing in the old part of the cemetery, and we found ourselves wandering about muddy paths, looking for old castiron markers that had been lost or misplaced, unsure which block we were in, or even where the boundaries of the block were. Often the gravestones were very worn, or had fallen — or pushed — over, or smashed.

We found one grave, but were not sure where we could find the others, when we heard the sound of a car driving along the paths, and Pagler appeared. In spite of his busy schedule, he had come to help us out.

The first stone we found (that of my maternal great-grandparents) had been knocked over and was lying on its back. Though otherwise undamaged, the soft limestone/marble was very worn. Pagler offered to set it up again and recut the inscription, at cost. Two weeks later, when we were back in Canada, we received a letter from him with some photographs of the job, beautifully completed. Taking into account the time for a letter to reach us, he must have had it repaired right after we were there.

Walter Pagler is a friendly, cheerful, unassuming and caring man. He is also astute, and a real doer. I wanted to take a photo of him at work, but he was unwilling, saying he was just an ordinary Viennese, not worthy of any special attention. But he is. He is one of the chassidei umos ho'olom (Righteous Gentiles).

Further information can be obtained from Herr Walter Pagler, "Schalom," Tor 1, Zentral Friedhof, AZ 1110 Vienna, Austria. (Tel: 76-15-07)

Yom Kippur: A time of hunger and atonement

By ERICA MEYER RAUZIN

On Yom Kippur, we pray for forgiveness for our sins. We pray for atonement. We are penitent but hopeful. Even those who observe no other fasts, observe this one.

From sunset on erev Yom Kippur until an hour after sunset the next evening, we do not eat or drink. To us, this is a very big deal. At least it is to me.

Many of us, myself included, fast with great difficulty. I stuff myself with pasta before the fast begins, having learned that carbohydrates fill me up longer and help me fast better. Usually, I make it past lunch time without complaining but by mid-afternoon, I'm headachy and beset with queasy hunger and thirst. My typical solution is to go to bed.

I don't think I have a particularly spiritual attitude about fasting, but I am trying to change. If I can't attach spirituality to my cranky appetite, maybe I can use it to learn empathy instead.

Like the rest of us, I care about world hunger and have written about it, and done what "nice" people do. I have contributed to the homeless, the flood victims, the impoverished third worlders, to CARE and Oxfam. I have gone to meetings and served on committees.

But, I guess I have never drawn a close enough parallel between their hunger and my one day of deliberate deprivation. Well, let me draw it now. Let me absorb in my bones a true understanding of what it is to hunger. Let me sense it truly beyond writing a check, beyond sighing at a news report, let me feel.

Erica Meyer Rauzin

It is erev Yom Kippur. I finish my meal before sunset. That night, I go to bed with a faint wish that I could have my midnight snack. In Brazil, a street orphan curls up under a stairwell, empty, alone, a loser in the day's begging competition.

I wake up and dress for shul. I give my kids breakfast, making sure they know that I'm not having anything. In Haiti, a mother cooks beans for her kids. She takes enough to maintain her own strength. When the pan is empty, they are all still hungry.

I line my kids up in their best clothes and we walk to shul. It's hot here and I'm sort of uncomfortable. After shul, we walk home. By now, I'm pushing the fast. My stomach is rumbling. I'd die for a drink. In Rwanda, people do.

We all watched on television as refugees staggered over the border fleeing to Zaire for their lives, entering cholera-ridden compounds where someone died every minute: some mother who hoped for a better future for her children; some daughter whose parents delighted in her sense of humor; some baby, some grandpa, someone, every minute. At first, the bodies were laid in neat rows, each wrapped in a shroud. By the time the first week of the crisis had passed, corpses were being thrown into trenches.

I wish we could understood why such tragedies are allowed to happen, but that is the unanswerable question, not only for mass calamities, but for family tragedies as well, not only in Rwanda, but throughout time. We have seen bodies thrown into pits before, at other times, for other reasons. The horror does not diminish. The questions remain unanswerable.

By late afternoon, my nap is over. I'm up but lightheaded, foggy from fasting. I feel totally out of sorts. Downtown in this city and in others across the country, dazed homeless families line up outside a soup kitchen, waiting for their one daily meal.

The sun goes down. An hour later, we sit at a table filled with food. We eat until we are sated, and then, perhaps, we eat a little more. Some cake. Some wine. Some coffee. But they are still hungry, and will be tomorrow: the homeless, the refugees, the oppressed, the impoverished.

So fast; be hungry for this single day and think of their hunger. Take the dollars you would have spent on a day of fine eating and spend them to feed the hungry.

The opening prayer on erev Yom Kippur says, "Turn us unto Thee, O Lord, so that we may be at peace with ourselves and with our fellow men."

That does not suggest that you are seeking only peace between yourself and the Lord, nor only peace with your fellow Jews — though that is rare enough — but peace with your fellow humans. That includes everyone, from the Brazilian street urchin to the hopeless man downtown, to a sunken-faced, desperate Rwandan mother.

This year, may we fast with kavanah, depth, heart, compassion. If the minor discomfort we take on deliberately reveals to us one drop of their agony, if it penetrates our inner hearts, then we will be changed . . . perhaps even changed enough to act. And if we do not act, then we will truly need forgiveness, for we will have failed not only as repentant Jews, but as human beings.

Germany's ever-present past

How do Germans perceive the Holocaust? Sheldon Kirshner reports from Berlin, Frankfurt and Bonn.

By SHELDON KIRSHNER

Call it the ever-present past.

The Holocaust — and particularly Germany's central role in its conception and implementation — haunts the majority of Germans.

For better or worse, it is writ large in their collective consciousness.

The Holocaust is recalled in concentration camp memorials, monuments, schools, books, newspaper and magazine articles, films, television, movies and plays.

And it is never far from the minds of politicians when they evoke the Third Reich.

But how do Germans relate to the Holocaust?

Surveys suggest that many are simply weary of being constantly reminded about it. In 1992, Der Spiegel found that 62 per cent would rather not discuss it anymore. A poll released earlier this year by the American Jewish Committee revealed that 56 per cent of Germans in western areas of the country, and 36 per cent in eastern regions, felt that it has been discussed too much.

Jewish leaders in Germany are well aware of this fatigue.

Ignatz Bubis, chair of the Central Council of Jews in Germany, observed: "Unfortunately, the German people — not yet a majority — are tired of hearing about it and would like to forget."

Concurring with Bubis, Jerzy Kanal, chair of the community in Berlin, commented: "After 50 years, most Germans think it's enough."

Non-Jews sympathetic to Jewish concerns detect the same kind of weariness.

Jacqueline Giere, an historian at the Fritz Bauer Institute Auxiliary in Frankfurt, which studies the impact of the Holocaust on German society, noted: "It's hard for Germans to accept the Holocaust as part of Germany's image. Germans are always confronting their ever-present past, and a lot of them don't want to be reminded anymore."

Werner Bergmann, a sociologist at the Centre for Research on anti-Semitism at Berlin's Technical University, pointed to a trend in right-wing intellectual circles which holds that, after almost five decades of endless debate and handwringing, "a line has to be drawn."

Certain figures in this milieu, notably the Berlin historian Ernst Nolte, compare the Holocaust to previous atrocities and thus chip away at its unique character. Their intention is to lift the burden of guilt from Germany's shoulders, Bergmann suggested.

Last year, this theme was sounded by Steffen Heitmann, the minister of justice in the eastern state of Saxony.

Despite such sentiments, the incidence of Holocaust denial in Germany is no higher than it is in Canada or the United States, Bergmann pointed out.

In Germany, however, it is a crime to question the historical fact of the Holocaust, as a recent case illustrates.

At a rally in 1991, Gunter Deckert, head of the extreme right-wing National Democratic party, translated a speech delivered by the American Holocaust denier, Fred Leuchter. Furthermore, he came out in support of Leuchter's theories.

Subsequently, Deckert was convicted of inciting racial hatred and sentenced to one year in prison. Last March, an appeals court overturned the conviction. In April, the Constitutional Court ruled that freedom of speech does not apply to neo-Nazis who claim the Holocaust is a hoax. In June, Deckert received a one-year suspended sentence and was fined DM 10,000.

The upshot of it all was that the Social Democratic party tabled a so-called Auschwitz Lie law. It was designed to bolster existing legislation which classifies Holocaust denial as a crime.

The lower house of parliament approved the proposed bill. The upper house killed it because opponents objected to a provision allowing the federal intelligence agency to tap international phone calls on behalf of prosecutors.

* * *

The Holocaust is remembered in a variety of ways, according to Giere, an American-born Methodist who wrote her doctorate thesis on displaced persons camps in the U.S. zone in Germany.

- There are memorials in former concentration camps (Buchenwald, Sachsenhausen, Bergen-Belsen, Dachau, Ravensbruck and Neuengamme), as well as in former labor camps (Breitenau, Hadamar and Emsland.)
- Local communities produce albums and pamphlets about their vanished Jewish communities. These projects were initially undertaken in the early 1980s under the impetus of the American TV series, Holocaust, which had an enormous impact in Germany. Several hundred towns have joined this growing trend.
- Communities invite their former Jewish inhabitants, now living abroad, for visits free of charge.
- Cities erect plaques and monuments. In Berlin's Schonberg district, for example, 80 signs graphically remind pedestrians of the horrors of the Holocaust. At the Grunewald train station, from which 35,000 Jews were shipped eastward to their deaths, a monument is to be built.
- Museums put on special exhibitions. The Museum for Transportation and Technology in Berlin mounted an exhibition on the role of German railroads in the Final Solution.
- A flood of books, television programs and plays dissect Nazism and the Holocaust, perhaps more so than in any other country outside Israel.
- Holocaust education in schools. In the immediate post-war period, the topic was taboo, somewhat like sex. For all practical purposes, students in the 1950s and 1960s remained ignorant. Often, they gleaned their information from emotionally intense confrontations with their parents and grandparents.

The seminars, given in cooperation with trade unions, involve railway workers, civil servants and police. "The novelty of our approach is to show, by way of documents and trade journals from the Nazi era, how this or that occupational group took part in carrying out the Final Solution," explained Wolf Kaiser, a House of the Wannsee Conference official.

"It's not just a history lesson," he added. "The idea is to sensitize them to undemocratic attitudes."

The House of the Wannsee Conference — which is situated in a beautiful wooded neighborhood adjacent to an idylic lake — also offers seminars for younger and older students.

"Our task here is to stimulate discussion. Basic data they can get at school."

More often than not, students are jolted into an awareness of the Holocaust by an experience outside the bounds of the classroom, he said. The House of the Wannsee Conference tries to create these conditions with joint field trips for German and Israeli students to former concentration camps in Poland.

In keeping with its austerity drive, the German government has of late reduced subsidies for the upkeep of Holocaust memorials. The House of the Wannsee Conference has been affected by these budget cuts, but not in any fundamental sense.

What most concerns Kaiser is the future. "Drastic reductions are possible, and they would impinge on our programs." Still, Kaiser is sanguine. As he put it, "I have the impression that the government would think twice before making deep cuts. The eyes of the world are on Germany."

Kaiser does not believe that Germany needs a central Holocaust museum. A year ago, a plethora of prominent German politicians, writers, artists and theologians pressed for this in a well-publicized appeal.

"Germany," Kaiser said, "has many Holocaust memorials and monuments. A decentralized approach is preferable."

Werner Bergmann [Frank Schroder]

Nowadays, the Holocaust is an integral component of the curriculum in primary and secondary schools. Nevertheless, teachers set the tone, more or less determining the quantity and quality of knowledge imparted.

Not surprisingly, many students have grown indifferent to the topic, in the opinion of Rolf Ballot, chair of the German Federation of History Teachers. To counter this resistance, German and Israeli educators recently met at a seminar in Wurzberg, sponsored by the Friedrich-Ebert Foundation and the Yad Vashem Holocaust memorial-cum-museum.

- Adult education programs. The House of the Wannsee Conference (the site where the Holocaust was systematically formalized in January 1942) in Berlin offers one-day to one-week seminars for occupational groups which participated in the extermination process.

Memorial in Berlin

In Berlin, Sheldon Kirshner discusses a planned Holocaust memorial with a member of the fundraising committee.

It will be a place for mourning and reflection, according to Inge Borck, a Holocaust survivor.

The Memorial to the Murdered Jews of Europe, to be built on the very site of Hilter's chancellery near Germany's old parliament building, is expected to cost DM 16 million.

Inge Borck [Frank Schroder]

Half the funds will be donated by the federal government and the state of Brandenburg. The rest will come from a patrons' association. Mercedes and Bosch, companies which employed forced Jewish laborers during World War II, are among the contributors.

Although an architect has yet to be selected, construction is due to start in 1996. More than 1,000 architects and artists from around the world have submitted designs. The winner will be announced in January 1995.

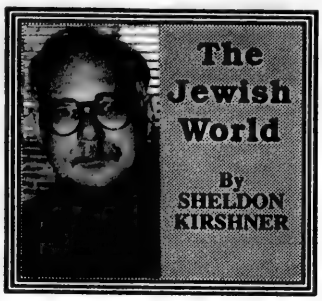
The idea was proposed by Lea Rosh, director of the North German Radio in Hannover, whose grandfather is Jewish, Borck said.

Born in Berlin, Borck survived the Holocaust by the skin of her teeth, eking out a hand-to-mouth underground existence. Christian friends, false documents and her Aryan appearance helped her to survive.

Her parents, Martin David and Paula, were not so fortunate. They tried, without success, to emigrate to Argentina and Thailand. Rounded up and taken to an assembly centre on Grosse Hamburger Street in Berlin, they were shipped to Auschwitz, where they perished in August 1943.

After the war, Borck rebuilt her life, becoming a fashion designer and a factory owner with 400 employees.

Recalling her parents' fate, she hopes that their names and that of other Jews in Berlin who were murdered in the Holocaust will be engraved on the memorial.



Yehoshafat Harkabi was a graduate of the school of realism. By turns a soldier and a scholar, he was a pragmatist who subscribed to the axiom that politics is the art of the possible.

Harkabi — who died on August 26 in Jerusalem at the age of 72 — had a distinguished career. He was chief of military intelligence from 1955 to 1959, a security advisor to several Israeli prime ministers, a professor of international relations and Middle East studies at the Hebrew University, a lecturer at Israel's National Defence College and the author of critically acclaimed books which dissected the Arab-Israeli conflict.

He was also one of the first Israelis to call for direct talks with the PLO — an organization he had studied and analysed thoroughly — and for withdrawal from the territories.

Calling himself a "Machiavellian dove," Harkabi never pretended to possess a monopoly on the truth. "I don't claim my solution is good," he told me during a visit to Toronto in 1989. "I simply say it's better than the status quo. We must choose not between good and bad — but between bad and worse."

A third-generation Sabra from Haifa, Harkabi ardently believed that Israel's withdrawal from the territories was in its own self-interest. He argued that Israel's continued presence in the West Bank and the Gaza Strip would engender further violence, corrupt and coarsen Israeli society, encourage the growth of Islamic fundamentalism and ultimately bring Israel closer to a demographic time bomb.

The last point was of crucial importance. By retaining the territories, with their higher Arab birthrate, Israel's Jewish character would be diluted, and the seeds of an inherently divisive, unstable binational state would be planted.

Soldier and scholar

Harkabi, too, scoffed at the notion, still popular in right-of-centre circles, that Jewish settlements in the territories are of strategic value.

I met Harkabi for the first time in the summer of 1979. We spoke at his spartan apartment in Jerusalem's French Hill quarter. He was busy writing at his desk, piled high with books and documents. He was a compact man with a furrowed brow, clad in short shorts and a jersey. He looked like a typical kibbutznik. Harkabi was laconic and thoughtful. He did not suffer fools gladly.

By then, he was a respected figure in Israeli academia, having written a blizzard of monographs and books. His best-known works, The Palestinian Covenant and its Meaning, and Between Israel and the Arabs painted a frightening portrait of an Arab world conspiring to destroy Israel.

Known as a hawk on Arab-Israeli affairs, Harkabi gradually altered his philosophy when he detected shifts in the Arab/Palestinian position. Warning against policies driven by zealotry rather than realism, he urged Israel to deal with the PLO and to relinquish the territories.

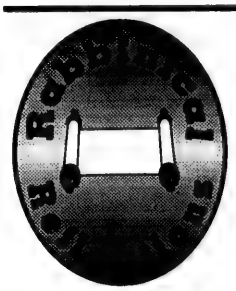
In his penultimate book, Israel's Fateful Hour, published in the late 1980s, Harkabi wrote that Israeli efforts to make diplomatic end runs around the PLO would fail. As he put it: "Israel will inevitably have to negotiate with the PLO. There is no hope for a local (Palestinian) leadership distancing itself from the PLO. Any attempt to drive a wedge between the PLO and the Palestinians (of the West Bank and Gaza) is doomed to failure."

Harkabi chided Yitzhak Shamir's government for its refusal to embrace the concept of territorial compromise. "The Zionist side always agreed to a two-state solution," he observed, referring to British and United Nations Palestine partition plans. "The PLO has now accepted the principle of partition... while Shamir says he won't accept two states. Insofar as Israel and the PLO are concerned, there has been a reversal of roles."

In his heart of hearts, Harkabi opposed a Palestinian state. "I'd prefer a big Israel..." he once said, "but we have to consider what is possible."

Neither an idealist nor an ideologue, Harkabi was simply a hard-headed analyst who abhorred the idea of luxuriating in illusions. "I didn't change my views," he said 15 years ago. "The situation has changed."

It is a fitting epitaph for a great man.



By RABBI LEIGH LERNER

This year the Jewish people recall the passing of Rabbi Menachem Mendel Schneerson. A man who commanded such loyalty and devotion, whose followers number up to a quarter million, whose work is in every corner of the Jewish world, such a man has something to teach through his life.

We liberals can learn from Menachem Mendel Schneerson something to make our new year a better one. Here's what I learned from the Lubavitcher Rebbe.

There are two kinds of chassidic rebbes. Some remove themselves from modern life. Others, like the Lubavitcher Rebbe, prefer to make their presence felt in modern culture. One of the more open chassidic masters said he could learn a Torah thought from anything. "What can you learn from a train?" his disciples wanted to know. He responded, "One hot one can pull many cold ones."

The Lubavitcher Rebbe served as the one hot one for his Chassidim, and thereby did he pull many cold ones along with him, transforming them into troops doing battle for traditional Jewish practices. Just as your automobile tires grow warmer as they roll over the highway, so these mitzvah troops warmed to their task by their daily contact with it.

What a contrast to our contemporary ways! We seem more interested in maintaining our cool than in getting hot. Too often, they've got passion, we've got fashion. They're on the attack, while we're laid back.

I look at the high-tone models in the print advertisements and on TV, and I see in their faces disdain, unconcern, a coolness that bespeaks self-centered uninvolvement, and I fear, eleh elohecha yisrael, these are your gods, O Israel; these are the models we have selected for ourselves. If they're our hot ones, we're not going to be cool. We'll just be fashionably cold and indifferent.

But each of us, warming to one mitzvah that we believe in, can become one of the hot ones. We say we believe in the Ten Commandments. What about number four, Shabbat? In this new year, can we stoke up the heat and warm our souls toward Shabbat with a beautiful Shabbat table where family gathers round, or a day of rest from work or shopping? We each set the temperature for Shabbat, warm or cold to its possibilities for our soul.

In this new year, can we stoke up the heat a little and warm our souls towards the mitzvah of tzedakah? A contribution to your federation says you're hot to do something about Jewish poverty at home and in Israel. A gift to Mazon shares your break-the-fast with hungry Canadians across the nation. How can we not get hot about feeding the hungry?

Something else I learned from Menachem Mendel Schneerson: pay attention to the soul.

Despite our university degrees and our material success, we Jews are still human beings, with a human soul that needs nourishing.

When we were making our way into society, it was great art, and lofty philosophy that uplifted our humble souls. Now that we are sophisticated souls with masters degrees, it is the simple rituals and down-to-earth wisdom that seem to touch us.

Rabbi Schneerson taught that the Jewish soul needs Jewish nourishment, and sometimes that nourishment is simplicity itself. His campaigns tried to touch the Yiddishe Neshamah, the Jewish soul, that pintileh Yid, that small point of Jewish light within every one of us that feels somehow different from our neighbors.

I believe most of us feel the larger world's needs and naturally want to reach in our pocket to provide relief for the entirely non-Jewish population of Rwanda. We naturally feel uncomfortable when homelessness or racial discrimination is ignored in favor of purely Jewish needs, or when some rabbis line up to harass those who favor the right to advertise a bathing suit in Jerusalem. We're not about to unlearn what more liberal Judaisms have taught.

On this Yom Kippur, let us have the flexibility to recognize with Rabbi Schneerson that the Jewish soul has specific needs, even as we participate in a wider world crying for repair. Those needs can only be met through deeds that have their source in Torah.

Rabbi Leigh Lerner is the spiritual leader of Temple Emanu-El-Beth Sholom in Montreal.

Israel's new get bill expected to improve plight of agunot

Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM — A new bill likely to pass the Knesset would strengthen sanctions the rabbinical courts could levy against husbands who refuse to grant divorces to their wives.

The bill reflects an effort to improve the plight of thousands of Israeli agunot (women whose husbands refuse to grant them a get, or Jewish divorce) and who, therefore, are forbidden by Jewish law to remarry. Civil marriage is not performed in Israel.

Given that it was prepared by the Justice and Religious Affairs ministries, with the approval of the rabbinical courts, the legislation will likely have the support of the religious parties in the Knesset and thus, a good chance of passing.

Women's groups say they welcome the legislation as a first step in addressing the problem. They add, however, they would prefer to see the authority over the recalcitrant husbands be in the hands of the civil, rather than religious, courts.

"The religious courts don't use the authority they already have, and we're afraid they won't use the [increased] authority this law gives them," said Gittit Nachliel, a lawyer in the rabbinical courts and the coordinator for the International Coalition for Agunah Rights.

But Nachliel acknowledged that shifting the authority to the civil courts is impossible in the current political climate, which essentially gives the religious parties veto power.

Given the political realities, she said, "We'll give them a chance."

Current law allows for the rabbinical courts to have a man imprisoned in order to force him to grant a get. But for those not imprisoned, the bill would bar these men from getting a passport, opening a bank account, getting a job in the public sector or working in a field that requires a government license.

The bill was discussed last month in a special meeting of the Knesset law committee. The committee is expected to take it up again with judges from the religious courts before it is put before the full Knesset for a vote.

University students to examine key issues at Network conference

By FRANCES KRAFT
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Campus Connections '94, scheduled for the weekend of Sept. 30 to Oct. 2, will provide thought-provoking speakers, kosher meals and even a bonfire kumsitz to Jewish university students from across Ontario.

The program is Network Canada's annual central region convention. It follows a national leadership development seminar which took place in late August at Maple Lake. Network Canada is the Canadian arm of World Union of Jewish Students.

Students will be bussed from Toronto on Friday afternoon to Caledon Hills Leisure Village (Camp Reena), where the convention will be held.

Facilities at the centre include nature trails and an indoor sports complex. Accommodation will be in winterized cabins and meals are included.

Speakers include Haim Waxman, vice-consul of Israel, on What Can We Do For Today's Israel?, and Steve Shulman of Canadian Jewish Congress on Racism and Anti-Semitism on Campus.

Other topics to be addressed at the convention include interdating and intermarriage, Israel summer programs, the peace process and the Jewish Federation.

Rabbi Benji Jacoby will be on hand for an open discussion (Rappin with the Rabbi) and to lead services.

"We're looking to get people meeting and connecting from different campuses," said Simon Rucker, central region co-chair along with Sara Bergson.

"It's for all Jewish students and young adults. There's something in it for everyone, and even if you don't know anyone, you'll know people by the time you leave," said Rucker.

Registration fee is $84 ($74 for those registering before Sept. 15) including meals, accommodation and transportation. There is also a $74 "frosh special" for first-year students. Subsidies are available upon request.

For further information contact the Network office at (416) 783-1165 (fax (416) 783-1166), or call Rucker at (905) 731-4743.

Former IDF general backs Middle East peace process

TORONTO — After a 30-year career in the Israel Defence Forces (IDF), General Nathan Sharony knows a thing or two about advancement and retreat.

So when Sharony, the worldwide president of State of Israel Bonds says it is impossible to pull back from the peace process, his declaration is supported by personal experience.

"The peace process is something that is irreversible," Sharony recently told a combined Israel Bonds/UJA breakfast audience in Toronto.

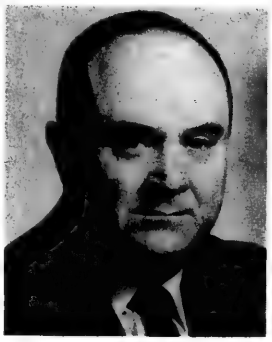
He described current global political conditions as "opportune" for Mideast peace because of the collapse of the Soviet Union and "deteriorating Arab economies."

Even Syria, he predicted, will be bargaining directly with Israel over the Golan Heights in two or three months.

Sharony drew a parallel between negotiations with Syria today and Israel's historic Sinai settlement with Egypt in 1978. "All of the questions raised today are the same," he said. "What will happen if [Hafez al-]Assad is assassinated? Can we really rely on the Syrians? The question is 'Do we take the risk or don't we?' It's a calculated risk, but we have to take it."

Sharony's appeal for Bonds investment was based on the $40 billion required by Israel to support olim from the former Soviet Union through the end of this decade. Bonds proceeds are directed towards immigrant job creation and employment training.

However, "the needs are way beyond $10 billion dollars in U.S. loan guarantees," he noted. "We invest $4 billion in infrastructure, which is well below what we should do. We need to build roads and harbors."



Nathan Sharony

Last year, Bonds investors brought Israel about $1 billion — over $100 million from Canada — which, according to Sharony, does not jeopardize Israel's international credit rating because the funds are raised outside financial markets.

Sharony joined the IDF in 1952 and then fought in three wars before retiring in 1982, with the rank of Major General. He held senior business positions for seven years before heading Israel's Economic Mission to North America between 1989 and 1992. After a short stint as director-general of Israel's Ministry of Trade, he was appointed to his current post last year.

Vaughan backs construction of new Aish HaTorah Centre

By RON CSILLAG
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Aish HaTorah, the global Jewish outreach organization, has cleared a crucial hurdle in constructing its $2-million Dan Family Community Centre in Thornhill.

Vaughan's city council last week voted unanimously to grant Aish HaTorah an exemption that will allow the organization to have 100 fewer parking spaces on its property than by-laws would require.

The vote gives Aish HaTorah the green light to break ground for the facility, to be located on Clark Avenue west of Bathurst Street, immediately west of the Reena Foundation's proposed Toby and Henry Battle day care and drop-in centre for developmentally disabled adults.

Groundbreaking for the Battle Centre is expected later this month, while construction on the two-storey Aish HaTorah building is expected to begin within two months.

City of Vaughan by-laws require the Aish HaTorah building to have roughly 170 parking spaces. But a municipal engineering department study agreed that 71 parking spaces would be adequate, except for three or four occasions per year.

Despite council's 8-0 vote to approve the parking exemption, area residents turned out at last week's public hearing to voice concerns over increased street parking and congestion.

The residents, mainly from surrounding Tansley Road, Millcroft Way and McMorran Crescent, fear users of the Dan Family centre will park on their already-clogged streets.

The ratepayers all said they approve of the centre — some said they look forward to attending lectures and programs there — but feared more cars on their streets would be dangerous for children and make traffic worse.

One resident said Tansley Road "has been a disaster for years." Others argued that a walkway connecting Tansley to Clark would further entice users of the centre to park on side streets.

But residents were reassured that few if any users of the centre would park on their streets.

Murray Nightingale, a lawyer representing Aish HaTorah, told council that the Reena Foundation will allow after-hours parking on its site, and that the Promenade Shopping Centre will allow the centre to use up to 50 parking spaces, five times a year.

Parking is also available at the new Bathurst-Clark library, especially in the evenings, when most Aish HaTorah programs are held, Nightingale said. He pointed out that on Shabbat and most Jewish holidays, the parking lot would be closed and people would walk to the centre.

A northern branch of Aish HaTorah has been in the Promenade Mall for over a year.

Nightingale said there is "a great need" for the new campus because many young Jewish families are moving north of Metro, mostly to Thornhill.

Council agreed, stating the centre would enhance the community and create minimal parking problems.

However, the city will study the parking situation created by the Aish HaTorah building. A community meeting will take place soon after a report is completed.

Coun. Bernie Green said he wants the city to examine permit parking on Tansley Road.

The 17,000-sq. ft. centre will be the largest Aish HaTorah campus in Canada. It is named for the family of Leslie Dan, chair of Novopharm Inc. and supporter of many causes in the Jewish community, including Aish HaTorah.

The centre will house adult educational classes, programs for women and children, public lectures and religious services.

Sotheby's auction planned

TEL AVIV — International auction house Sotheby's is capping 10 years in Israel with a September sale of modern Jewish art and important Judaica.

Paintings by Marc Chagall, Chaim Soutine and Reuven Rubin are up for grabs Sept. 27. The works begin at $8,000 for The Shepherdess, by Menashe Kadishman, and go to $450,000 for Chagall's Prophet with Torah in the Shtetl.

Among the lots expected to go under the hammer Sept. 29 at the Tel Aviv Hilton is an English silver candelabra presented to philologist Dr. Louis Loewe for his help in rescuing Damascan Jews accused of blood libel in 1840.

The candelabra, valued at between $50,000 and $70,000, was given to Loewe by Sir Moses Montefiore, who intervened with a number of European Jews on behalf of the accused.

Sotheby's sales in Israel reached $15 million in 1993. To find out more about the Sept. 27 and 29 sales, contact director Rivka Saker in Tel Aviv by telephone 972 3 5223822, or by fax 972 3 5225454.

Feminist Sukkot ceremony planned

By FRANCES KRAFT
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — For the past two years Jewish women in Toronto have had the opportunity to celebrate Sukkot in a unique feminist ceremony which, so far, is the only one of its kind in North America.

This year the third annual Succah-By-The-Water will be held on Sept. 25 from 7 p.m. to 10 p.m. at Harbourfront's Tent in the Square. Participants in the event will include feminist writer Michele Landsberg and Orthodox feminist scholar Norma Joseph of Montreal. Rabbis Elyse Goldstein, Nancy Wechsler, Sharon Sobel and Cheryl Nosan, along with cantorial soloists Phyllis Angel Greenberg and Anna Trubashnik will also participate.

Elaine Todres, deputy provincial cultural minister, will be a featured singer, as will Pam Halpern, Jane Enkin and Batsheva.

A symbolic sukkah will have a prominent on-stage position. Each year local Jewish woman artists create the striking silk panels which form its walls. (Following this year's event, the panels from all three years will be on display at the Koffler Gallery from Sept. 27 until Oct. 29.)

Succah-By-The-Water gives a feminist twist to traditional sukkot ceremonies such as the Ushpizin, in which symbolic guests are invited to enter the sukkah. Last year, they included heroines of Jewish history as well as agunot (women whose husbands won't give them a Jewish divorce).

Each woman is encouraged to participate in the celebration and to bless the lulav and etrog individually. Light refreshments appropriate to the harvest festival are served.

The event is run by a group of volunteers in support of the New Israel Fund (NIF) of Canada, to underwrite its women's projects in Israel. The NIF is a joint Israeli-North American venture established in 1979 to address social and economic issues in Israel. Last year Succah-By-The-Water raised $25,000 for projects such as battered women's shelters and rape crisis centres.

Tickets are $18 and must be purchased in advance. Succah Supporter tickets, which benefit a student or senior unable to afford a ticket, are $36.

Tax receipted categories are "Succah Sister," a donation of $180; "Succah Mama," $360; and "Succah Bubbie," $720. The latter two categories were created this year at the request of donors.

For further information, or to order tickets, call the NIF office at (416) 515-0507.

Free Torah High School operates in four locations

For several years, Free Torah High School (FTHS) has provided hundreds of public school students with the unique opportunity to strengthen and develop their Jewish identity.

FTHS classes for the coming year will be held in four different locations: Our northern branch will meet every Monday and Wednesday evening from 4:30-6:30 p.m. at Beth Avraham Yoseph Congregation, 613 Clark Avenue, Thornhill.

The southern branch will meet Monday evenings from 4:30-6:30 p.m. Classes will be held at the NCSY Centre, 3524 Bathurst Street.

Our eastern branch will meet at Kehillat Shaarei Torah which is located at 2640 Bayview Avenue, Willowdale. Classes will be held on Monday evenings between 4:30-6:30 p.m.

Our Richmond Hill chapter has been established at the Country Shul, which is located at the Bathurst and Carville Plaza. Classes will be held on Monday evenings from 4:30-6:30 p.m.

Classes begin at all four Branches on Monday, Oct. 3, 1994.

Registration will take place on Monday, Sept. 12 at all branches, and at BAYT on Tuesday, Sept. 13 between 4:30-6:30 p.m.

Making Judaism relevant, vibrant and free to Jewish youth is the main objective of FTHS, a non-profit afternoon program for students of all backgrounds.

FTHS offers challenging courses of Judaic studies to students from all segments of the Jewish community: Sephardi, Ashkenazi, affiliated and non-affiliated.

With an emphasis on the individual needs of the participants, the FTHS staff and administration have created an open and comfortable atmosphere which allows for a comprehensive Jewish educational experience. Through the combined use of traditional texts, innovative teaching methods and discussions, students learn to examine source material.

Throughout the year, students are invited to participate in an array of special events, such as holiday celebrations, weekend retreats, trips, dinners, special presentations and lectures.

The FTHS offers a wide variety of programs specifically designed to meet the needs of all participants. The Machon program, designed for Grades 7-8 focuses on preparing students for their bar/bat mitzvah years. The Grade 9-12 program is extensive and caters to students' needs and interests.

The diverse course curriculum includes Jewish History, Roles in Judaism, Chumash, and a Hebrew Language course for all levels. For the more advanced student, FTHS offers a chavruta and a Kollel program.

The staff at FTHS have varied educational backgrounds and individual talents; they share a common dedication to Jewish Education and a genuine sensitivity to the needs of the individual high school students.

What attracts many students to FTHS is its unique informal setting, which not only creates a comfortable learning environment, but also serves as a social centre for Jewish Teens from the various areas of Toronto.

Family Matters

by

John Syrtash, B.A. (Hon.), LL.B.

There is a better way

The biggest single problem in family law is that litigating often makes matters worse. Rather than attempting to mediate a settlement of the dispute, many spouses unfortunately rush to the courts. Recently, litigating a Jewish divorce in Ontario has become particularly unmanageable. Regrettably, several Jewish families are in serious trouble and, when it comes to issues of divorce, there is often no legal service to which they can turn, except to litigate.

Issues which Jewish families must face, particularly traditional or Orthodox ones, include:

1. How to provide for the Jewish Holy Days after separation;
2. Which Jewish schools the children should attend or whether one or more of the children should attend public schools;
3. How to obtain the consent of one or the other spouse to a "get" (a Jewish divorce);
4. Transportation of the children before or after the Sabbath and, in certain cases, during the Sabbath; and,
5. The embarrassment of dealing with divorce in a public forum.

Services such as the Jewish Family and Child Service in Toronto have able social workers who are currently overburdened. They help individuals and groups in dealing with such subjects as anger control, wife and child abuse, as well as general marriage counselling. However, at the moment, if someone needs an urgent means of dealing with the issues arising from marital separation, that person goes through a family law lawyer who is usually, by training, not skilled in the art of mediation, but in the rigors of litigation.

Mediation is a process whereby an impartial, neutral third party (the mediator) is retained to effect a resolution of issues between a couple in conflict. The process used is meetings – together and separately with the mediator. Resolution means the ultimate signing of a written agreement. Mediation is not marriage counselling. Mediation is a way for spouses to continue to work together to solve the new issues that come with separation.

In answer to the need for sensible intervention which can help resolve matters, hopefully without the need for courts, a group of lawyers in Toronto have formed the Jewish Family Mediation Service. The panel members are highly experienced family law lawyers who are trained in mediation. They open channels of communication, help each spouse to articulate his/her needs, help to identify the issues and obtain, in appropriate situations, input of other important individuals such as children, teachers, grandparents and rabbis. They do not give advice on Jewish law and refer spouses to their own rabbis for such advice.

The lawyer-mediator can make recommendations to both spouses and will prepare a draft memorandum which summarizes the agreements reached. This memorandum is forwarded to each spouse's legal counsel. Remember, spouses do need their own lawyers. The mediator simply helps to facilitate an agreement which will hopefully dramatically reduce the legal expenses involved in arriving at a resolution.

The mediator does not act as either spouse's lawyer, does not decide cases and will not take sides. However, the panel members will provide some educated input in areas which can be technically quite complex. The mediators are available to assist separating spouses to reach agreements in such areas as support, property and care of children.

Fired Leah Posluns, JCC employees launch protest outside UJA event

By AMY SATTIN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The anger of 32 fired Jewish Community Centre (JCC) and Leah Poslun Theatre employees fuelled a protest last week outside the United Jewish Appeal campaign launch.

More than 50 protesters gathered peacefully outside the Inn on the Park hotel last Tuesday, where UJA campaign workers were attending training sessions. The $40-million UJA fundraising campaign is run by the Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto, the group behind the rescue of the insolvent centre.

The 26 full-time and six part-time workers claim they were let go without sufficient notice or severance packages.

They were laid off August 25. The next day, the JCC filed a notice of intention to settle with creditors under the Bankrupty Act, making the staff part of the pool of unsecured creditors.

"To fire people right before the High Holidays, what kind of shande is that?" asked JCC volunteer Andrea Bricks.

Bricks and her fellow protesters said they were hoping to raise awareness amongst UJA workers about the firings. Many of the staff, after decades of JCC service, are now nearing retirement age. "I don't know what's out there for a person my age," said one staffer, a widow in her late 50s.

UJA volunteer Varda Bernstein paused to read the placards on her way into the hotel. "It's awful," she said. "We have quite a rich Jewish community and this should never have happened."

Federation spokesman Howard English watched the protest from a distance. He said the UJA volunteers inside the hotel had nothing to do with the JCC, which was forced to fire the staff because of its $17-million debt.

"We're not closing our eyes to their personal circumstances, but what was done was done to save [the 276 other jobs] and save the facilities," he said.

English said the Federation was not planning to dedicate special funding for the employees' severance packages, which could run up to 34 weeks of pay depending on the number of employment years.

But interim JCC director Sharon Bacal said the following day that she is fighting to make sure the employees are duly compensated.

While their status as unsecured creditors may prevent a full settlement, "I feel very strongly that the JCC has a legal duty with respect to this amount and it should be paid in full," Bacal said.

"We owe them that money. It's their fair entitlement and they're not asking for anything more."

That view may be welcome news. Reva Stern, artistic director of the Leah Posluns Theatre for 20 years, said at the protest she is launching a joint court action on behalf of the fired staffers.

"We belong to a Jewish centre, for God's sake," she said. "Even in the corporate world we wouldn't be treated this way, and we tend to think of the corporate world as heartless. This is sick."

New Leo Baeck campus set to open

By AMY SATTIN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — With just eight days to go before the start of school, things were a bit hectic last Wednesday at the spanking new Leo Baeck Day School campus in Thornhill.

Stepping around unpacked storage boxes and busy tradesmen, school administrator Rhona Birenbaum said she was sure the new building would be finished before its Sept. 8 opening.

That is when 425 students, from kindergarten to Grade 8, will move into their new classrooms — classrooms that even last week still lacked furniture, books and, in some cases, finished floors.

"I'm not nervous," said school director Zita Gardner. "Like anyone who has renovated a home knows, something always holds you up."

Most area residents know that the Atkinson Avenue school is no renovation. The 55,000-sq.ft. building was built from scratch over 11 months at a cost of $5 million. It was supposed to be completed before last week.

The new building was brought in within budget, said project manager Mark Nightingale of Makrimichalos Cugini Architects. He pointed to the lavender and aqua walls as an example.

"With schools, we try to make them fun, and color is a cost-effective way to have fun," he said.

Gardner and Birenbaum said another $1 million was spent on replacing upholstery, curtains, office equipment and other items brought from the former Kenton Drive campus. That building is now occupied by another tenant.

School treasurer Jerry Leiderman said $3 million was raised through a parent-initiated tuition levy of roughly $400 per year. The Dan and Koffler families contributed $1.25 million, he said, but the school needs to raise another $1 million to pay off the mortgage.

The Atkinson Avenue building is also home to the Canadian Council for Reform Judaism, the 100-family Temple Kol Ami and Kolel: A Centre for Liberal Jewish Learning.

The Leo Baeck campus at Holy Blossom Temple has 60 students from kindergarten to Grade 3. Gardner said the combined enrolment is up by 100 this year.

Photography exhibit captures heart of Jewish life.

A young girl joins the procession on Simchat Torah in the Beach Hebrew Institute.

By MIRIAM CHINSKY
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — A young girl cradles a Torah in her arms during a synagogue procession, her face touched with pride and reverence.

The picture is part of Home and Homeland: Jewish Images from Toronto to Israel, a solo exhibit by photographer Tobi Asmoucha.

Originally from Vancouver, Asmoucha, a photo arts graduate of Toronto's Ryerson Polytechnic University, is the daughter of an Ashkenazi mother born in Wales and a Sephardi father from Iraq. Recently returned from Jerusalem, northern Italy, Budapest, Prague and Britain — her Hasselblad carried in a supermarket shopping bag — she brings a wide understanding to her work.

The show is principally black and white. "It's more direct," she says. The images are of synagogues and shops in Toronto to Israeli villages and urban neighborhoods. Look at her photo of a saleswoman leaning over the counter in a local kosher butcher store and you're about to place an order. Watch an old man slowly retreating down a stepped alley in Jerusalem and you want to help him.

The black-and-white pictures cut to the core. At a Purim play in a Toronto synagogue, the laughter of one child and the wonder of another are almost palpable. Far away in a quiet quarter of Jerusalem, the silhouette of a bearded man against a stone wall is timeless.

Patterns and the play of light and darkness intrigue Asmoucha. Again in Jerusalem, shadows of hydro wires criss-cross a sunlit shuttered window.

She photographs strangers wherever she goes. A white-shawled woman leaning on her cane in a Druze village is wary at first, but she pauses for the camera. People seem to feel that Asmoucha is "trustable," and she adds, "They even offer me diet Cokes and cake!"

In the past year she has been busy mounting her own shows and assisting commercial photographers. When she was in Britain she was able to work legally because of her mother's background. "I could even get health care coverage," she notes.

During 1994 she has exhibited at the Ryerson Gallery, the Zack Gallery and Station Street Art Centre in Vancouver and the Toronto Outdoor Art Exhibition in Nathan Phillips Square.

Her ultimate goal, and she is confident that it is approaching, is to have her own studio. Obviously empathetic with the enthusiasms and whimsies of childhood, she wants to photograph youngsters, "not the serious portraits, but something unique about your child, showing his or her personality — not just the proper posed picture."

Home and Homeland is at the Beach Hebrew Institute, 109 Kenilworth Ave., until Sept. 28. Hours are Tuesdays, 3 p.m. to 9 p.m., Sundays 1 p.m. to 4 p.m. For more information call (416) 465-0956.

About People

TECHNION APPOINTMENT

Gerald Enchin has been appointed executive vice-president of the Canadian Technion Society, replacing Mannie Shimoni who is returning to Israel after eight successful years with the Canadian organization.

Gerald Enchin

Enchin, executive director of the London, Ont. Jewish Federation for the past eight years, returns to Toronto after a 14-year absence. He and his wife Brenda and their children Adam, Joshua and Samara have made their home in Thompson, Man.; Saskatoon, Sask.; and London.

Along with his experience in many forms of community service, Enchin has a degree and background in town planning, which also ties in well with the work being done by the Technion's Architecture and Town Planning Department, the only faculty of its kind in Israel.

UCS EDUCATIONAL DIRECTOR

United Congregational Schools of Greater Toronto has announced the appointment of Edmond Y. Lipsitz as educational director. The former director of education of the Canadian Jewish Congress has many years of experience in Jewish education and administration and brings to UCS a strong commitment to Jewish continuity through education.

HONORARY DEGREE

Gerald Freed, past president of the Windsor Jewish Federation, was awarded an honorary doctor of laws degree at the recent graduation ceremonies of the University of Windsor. Freed was cited for his philanthropy and service to both the Jewish and Windsor communities. Among his many activities, Freed has been president or chairman of the United Way, Metropolitan Hospital, Windsor Chamber of Commerce, the Lung Association, Windsor Essex Development Commission and the United Jewish Appeal. He is currently vice-president of the Greater Windsor Foundation. In adddition, Freed has chaired several important building campaigns including the I.L. Peretz Senior Citizens Building and the recently completed Freed Orman Conference Centre at Assumption University, his alma mater.

MEMORY LOSS EXAMINED

The Canadian Weizmann League, the young leadership division of the Toronto chapter of the Canadian Society for the Weizmann Institute of Science, recently held a special program entitled Memory Loss in the Elderly: What's the Cause? Dr. Morris Freedman, director of behavioral neurology at the Rotman Research Institute of Baycrest Centre, was guest speaker. The evening was hosted by Morris and Miriam Kerzner. From left are Morris Kerzner, national vice-president; Dr. Freedman; Miriam Kerzner, national board member; Lisa S.K. Winston and Allan J. Stitt, Weizmann League co-chairs.

DINNER DANCE

A tribute dinner was recently held at Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda Synagogue in honor of Helen and Joe Morgan by Raoul Wallenberg Yorkdale Circle Lodge B'nai Brith prior to a gala dinner dance in conjunction with Israel Bonds to be held on Oct. 2. Shown (from left) Michael Rosenberg, dinner co-chair; Joe and Helen Morgan, honorees; Yehuda Ben-Meir, guest speaker; Alex Grossman, chairman of the board, Canada-Israel Securities; and Ralph Snow, dinner co-chair.

Israeli athlete's success makes dad feel proud

By RUTH SCHWEITZER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — An Israeli businessman who got a new heart last year took home four gold medals in an international olympics for heart-transplant recipients held recently in Helsinki, Finland.

"First I was worried, but then I became very proud," said Robert Vardi of his son Bracja.

Vardi explained that he worried when he heard of his son's achievement this past July, as he feared that the strain of swimming competitively might have injured his son's health.

When the Toronto resident learned that his son's participation had been okayed by the Israeli heart surgeon who had performed his operation, he was relieved. "Then he must be in good shape," said Vardi.

Bracja, who lives in Ramat haSharon, got his new heart last August at Belinson Hospital in Petah Tikva after waiting four agonizing years. At 38 he was the youngest person ever to have a heart transplant in Israel.

Bracja's last bout of heart problems began five years ago when a pacemaker he had received at the age of 19 started giving him problems. Eventually his condition deteriorated so much that he could hardly walk ten paces.

"He had to change his place of living to a place where there was an elevator," recalled Vardi, "because he couldn't go upstairs."

When the long-awaited call from the hospital arrived — it was finally Bracja's turn for a transplant — a friend was ready to drive him there. The two of them got stuck in bumper-to-bumper traffic and Bracja panicked.

"He was petrified that he wouldn't get the heart if he did not arrive on time," said Vardi.

They called ahead on the car phone, to tell the hospital they were on the way. But when they arrived, they learned a heart patient in worse condition than Bracja was at the top of the list for the operation. The other patient, however, got cold feet at the last minute and Vardi's son went in for the operation.

At the start of the operation, the heart surgeon, told Bracja that he would wake up in about 10 hours. He would either have a new heart or, if his body rejected the heart, he would be on a cardiopulmonary bypass machine awaiting another one.

Happily, the operation was a success and "right away he felt that he could breathe freely and everything was functioning like he was a newborn," said his father.

Bracja recovered quickly and in six weeks he was back at work again, running his successful import business.

Vardi sings praises of the Belinson Hospital staff, their professionalism and the quality of medical care his son received.

"I had a feeling that nothing bad could happen to my son in the hospital. The constant loving care from highest doctor down to the cleaning staff could be an example to any civilized country with much more financial resources than the little country of Israel," he said.

This past June, Bracja remarried and, as Vardi put it, his son got "a new heart and a new wife" in the short space of a year. His daughter-in-law Segal carried the Israeli flag at the awards ceremony in Helsinki. She gives Bracja "the loving care and happiness that he never had in his life," said Vardi.

He added that Jiftach, his 12-year-old grandson, "is a wonderful and devoted son to his father."

Vardi is a Holocaust survivor who arrived in Israel in 1949, after leaving Hungary. From 1950 to 1952, he was a member of one of the first groups of Israeli paratroopers. He immigrated to Canada in 1971, while Bracja, his only child, stayed behind in Israel. An electrician by trade, Vardi was forced to stop working three years ago after he himself had a quadruple bypass.

He stays in constant touch with his son. "The connection between us," he said, "is very tight."

Israel Bonds to honor couple

TORONTO — You won't find his name in any textbook about Israel. But, the quiet contribution of Martin Markus and his wife Judith to Israel's growth has made a loud impact.

That's why State of Israel Bonds will be honoring Markus at a tribute dinner, Sept. 17, just after his 75th birthday.

"I love Israel," Markus declares emphatically.

"I get tears in my eyes every time I land there," adds his wife.

However, the Markus family commitment is more than mere emotion. The couple holds untold amounts in Israel Bonds because they have invested since Bonds began over 40 years ago.

When their son Norman announced that he was going to volunteer in Israel during the Yom Kippur War, his father simply said "G-d bless you."

Martin and Judith Markus were on the first commercial flight to Israel after the Yom Kippur War, and their most recent trip to celebrate their grandson's bar mitzvah was number 50.

Freedom to travel is something that Martin Markus, a World War II survivor, never takes for granted. In December 1940, he and thousands of other Romanian Jews were ordered to perform forced labor. His assignment was to pick up live land mines on the road. "A lot of us died," he remembers sadly.

In February 1943, Markus escaped and was eventually picked up by partisans, with whom he walked for two weeks day and night under the most bitter winter conditions. There was no food and no shelter. Many of his fellow marchers resorted to eating rats or anything else that could be captured.

He arrived in Canada, penniless and rootless, on the day before Rosh Hashanah three years after the war was over. Alone for the holiday, he found his way to Toronto's Romanian shul, which later became Adath Israel, where the Markus tribute dinner is taking place.

From Markus' early poverty to his eventual success as a Toronto store owner, the Markus family association with Adath Israel has been lifelong.

You'll never hear Martin Markus boasting about his survival skills or his attachment to Jewish life. His reaction to being honored is typically low key.

Martin and Judith Markus have two children and six grandchildren.

Makeup of Jewish families in Vancouver seen as changing

By MAURICE LUCOW
CJN Western Correspondent

VANCOUVER — Out of a total Jewish population of 19,375 in Greater Vancouver, 14,755 live in "economic families." Thirty-two per cent of these are intermarried families, which is more than double the percentage of intermarried Jewish families nationally.

These are some of the figures established by an analysis of the 1991 census by the Jewish Federation in Vancouver.

Statistics Canada (Statscan) regards the economic family as a household with two or more members related by blood, marriage, common law or adoption. Individuals living alone or in other arrangements are, by Statscan definition, not "families."

While 85 per cent of all Jews in Canada live in economic families, the figure for Greater Vancouver is only 80 per cent.

The Federation report estimates that 20 per cent of the Vancouverites live alone in non-family situations; 10.5 per cent are single-parent families of which 80 per cent are headed by women.

"We know," says Federation, "that many young single Jews moved to Vancouver and we know that older Jews, especially women, often live alone. But only one in five living alone are elderly. The remainder represent a young single population — and 15 per cent of them arrived between 1986 and 1991."

The husband-wife Jewish family is no longer the stereotypical one with two parents, two children, two pets. Over 30 per cent of couples have no children in the household; another 18 per cent have one. But 33 per cent do have two children and nearly 14 per cent have three. The small remaining group have more than three.

The Vancouver percentage of Jewish seniors is a little lower than the national figure. In the total Canadian Jewish population, 17.3 per cent are over 65; in Greater Vancouver, the figure is 13.1 per cent. Nationally, 9.6 per cent of seniors are between 65 and 74; Vancouver's figures are 6.9 per cent with 6.2 per cent of seniors over 75.

Of elderly Jews living alone in Vancouver, 42 per cent are females and 13 per cent are men. Those who live alone often have lower incomes and may experience greater isolation from community life, says Federation.

To cope with this, Federation is setting up a non-profit housing society; one of its mandates is to prepare a registry of housing options including home renovations, mortgages, home safety and congregate living.

In the matter of employment, Federation says Jews remain longer in the labor force; 22 per cent of all Canadian Jews over 65 were in the 1991 labor force; the figures for all Canadians was nine per cent.

Jewish women are a major factor in the work force. Of the national Jewish population, 75 per cent of Jewish women 40 to 64 years old were working in 1991, compared with 63 per cent of all Canadian women.

"Astonishingly," says Federation, "12 per cent of Jewish women over 65 were in the labor force compared with only five per cent of all Canadian women."

Looking at the overall Jewish picture, the report says Canadian Jews are three times more likely than Canadians as a whole to be in professions such as law, medicine or accounting. There is a large gap in the manual trades — only 13 per cent of Jews listed this occupational category in the census, compared to 41 per cent of Canadians generally.

Other favored Jewish occupations are management, administration, human service professions and sales.

The report states that poverty affects one in six Jews in Canada, or 15.7 per cent who live below the poverty line; Vancouver ranks third in levels of Jewish poverty among all Jewish centres, or 17.2 per cent. In the general population, 20 per cent live in poverty.

The Federation report estimates that since the census was taken in 1991, the Jewish population of Greater Vancouver has grown from 19,375 to 21,170.

WIZO Month, drive planned for Winnipeg

By MYRON LOVE
CJN Prairie Correspondent

WINNIPEG — For the first time in a decade or more, Hadassah-WIZO of Canada is launching WIZO Month and a new national drive in Winnipeg.

The new campaign is called Women for Women. According to Theresa Rosenberg, Winnipeg WIZO Month chair, it is a concentrated effort to help battered women — in Israel and Canada — by establishing hotlines, shelters, self-help groups, a half-way house, family counselling and legal advice.

"It's a serious situation," says Rosenberg of the matter of battered women in Israel. We will also be helping to furnish a home for battered women in Winnipeg."

The project will be introduced to the Hadassah-WIZO membership at a non-fundraising dinner on Oct. 6 at the Westin Hotel. The guest speaker will be Sheila Finestone, secretary of state for Multiculturalism and the Status of Women.

Pearl McGonigal, a former Lieutenant-Governor of Manitoba, the first woman ever appointed to the position, will be named the Hadassah-WIZO of Canada's Woman of the Year.

McGonigal has also served as a Winnipeg city councillor and deputy mayor.

Rosenberg sees the dinner and the Women to Women project as an opportunity to further boost Hadassah-WIZO membership and support in Winnipeg. The evening will also feature highlights of other WIZO projects in Israel, door prizes and musical entertainment.

It's time to re-examine the beliefs which shape our lives.

Yom Kippur offers a unique opportunity for spiritual change. Dr. Elliott Malamet, Professor of English Literature and renowned Jewish educator, will examine the prayers, historical background and symbols of Yom Kippur to show how this day focuses on the meaning of life.

This seminar will be like no other you will ever attend!

Reena Fun Day delights kids

By FRANCES KRAFT
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — From the time CITY-TV's Breakfast Television started broadcasting at 7 a.m. until the 10 p.m. 1994 Ford Mustang draw, the Promenade Shopping Centre in Thornhill was the place to be last Monday.

Reena Fun Day — the eighth annual such event — featured a kid-oriented smorgasbord of daytime activities and entertainment preceding an evening auction.

Entertainers included singer Jack Grunsky; Ronald McDonald live; cast members of Crazy for You; the Beverly Segal Dancers; Chef Pasquale; mentalist Mike Mandel; the Simple Tones, a teenage a capella group; and Cornilla Luna, star of Miss Saigon.

The mall corridors were filled with young children playing carnival games, having their faces painted, trying out the Velcro Wall, or playing virtual reality soccer.

A brief noon-hour ceremony brought together Rabbi Joseph Kelman of Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda Synagogue, a co-founder of the Reena Foundation; mayors William Bell of Richmond Hill, Lorna Jackson of Vaughan, Frank Scarpitti of Markham and Tom Walsh of Ajala; councillors Mario Racco Gino Rosatti; and Bernie Green of Vaughan and regional councillor Michael di Biasi of Vaughan with corporate sponsored Cadillac Fairview, Gateway Lincoln Mercury, Northtown and Ford, Cott Beverages and HOJ Leasing.

The ceremony included the unveiling of a scale model of the Toby and Henry Battle Development Centre to be built on Clark Avenue. The centre will offer social and recreational programs for about 200 developmentally handicapped adults and their families.

Jackson welcomed the centre "with open arms." Ground-breaking for the 50,000-sq. ft. building is scheduled for this fall.

"The Battle Centre will be another way the Reena Foundation will live up to its name by being a fun place, a happy place," said Rabbi Kelman.

"We ask for blessings of peace, health and dignity on Rosh Hashanah. The Reena Foundation has given dignity to so many people."

Funds raised at the event, including a percentage of the day's sales by over 50 participating Promenade merchants, will be put towards the Reena Foundation's $250,000, three-year pledge to support a wing in the Battle Centre.

The Reena Foundation is a non-profit agency dedicated to integrating developmentally handicapped adults into mainstream society.

Canadian volunteers help with Project Renewal camp

KFAR YONA — Four Canadian volunteers recently helped run an English-language summer camp in this community, Vancouver's Project Renewal twin.

The July camp for grade school students, or kefiada, is part of a nationwide system.

Nicola Anzarut, 24, Vanessa Lurie, 21, Lisa Romalis, 23, and Jody Schloss, 21, were chosed by the Greater Vancouver Jewish Federation to work in Kfar Yona. It is the second year for the camp, which had 45 students this year as compared to 33 last year.

"There is no doubt the kefiada has caught on, thanks to our Vancouver connection," said Betty Peleg, director of the Kfar Yona Community Centre.

Anzarut and Romalis are from Vancouver. Lurie and Schloss are Torontonians studying at the University of British Columbia.

The four were paired with host families and worked with Chaya Meron, a local teacher. "Everybody benefits," they said about the experience. "Local people don't ususally get to know people our age. The host families appreciate it. The kids get a lot from the experience. So do we — we love it."

TORONTO — Menashe (Max) Birnboim is active in business and at his synagogue. He drives a car and prepares and hosts Shabbat meals for his children, grandchildren and friends — a tradition he began many years ago.

Birnboim, who lives alone, recently celebrated his 90th birthday. (Some members of his family say he may be 91 or more.) For his birthday celebration, his three sons, Meyer, Chaim, and Roy and their wives, his seven grandchildren (three are married) and four great grandchildren hosted a festive party for 55 people.

As part of the celebration, the patriarch did the readings of the week — parshah and Haftorah — at the B'nai Torah Synagogue where he is an active member.

The party was held at Roy and Ronny Birnboim's home in Toronto. Nieces and nephews and other family members from Vancouver, Winnipeg, Ottawa and New York joined their Toronto family to celebrate Birnboim's birthday and to pay tribute to the spirit of this unusual man whom his family members describe as "kind hearted with positive attitudes — a man who treats everyone with respect which is first and foremost."

He was born in Kosiva, Poland, where his childhood and adolescence were steeped in family values and religious studies. His education was interrupted by World War I.

As a teenager, he was a leader in the Zionist movement and planned to make aliyah. When his passport was revoked because of controversial practices in his aliyah activities, he missed his boat to Palestine.

In 1929, he married Shifrah (Sophie) Garfinkel from the neighboring town of Komenicz in White Russia. His wife's brother lived in Canada and in 1930, Birnboim left for Canada. The following year, he brought his wife and infant son.

Menashe (Max) Birnboim

During the Depression, the Birnboims moved to Portage La Prairie, a small town 50 miles west of Winnipeg where he worked as a melamed (Hebrew teacher).

The family moved to Winnipeg in 1935 and he continued teaching Hebrew privately and worked as a shochet. When World War II broke out, he took a job in an airplane factory.

After the war, Birnboim purchased two small houses, renovated them and embarked on a new career in residential real estate.

He was involved in the Talmud Torah in Winnipeg and when a baal koreh (Torah reader) was needed at the synagogue, he was drafted and voluntarily served in this capacity for 27 years.

Throughout the interview with The CJN, the sprightly and animated Birnboim, whose modesty made it difficult for him to speak of himself, answered each question with quotations from the Bible and from parables.

Slipping from English to Yiddish and Hebrew, he spoke of the importance of his shul involvement and his joy in the friendly debates at the synagogue.

"I think that the essence of my father is how he conducts himself," says Roy. "My father's business accomplishments, whether in Poland or in Canada, were predicated on making a living for himself and his family, and he prided himself in doing so through an honest day's work.

Menashe Birnboim's spirit and youthful outlook on life defy the image of aging.

He lives concurrently in two worlds — the world of Talmud and religious studies and the world of commerce. Positive and optimistic, Birnboim's life is filled with joy and accomplishment.

Pride of Israel Synagogue dedicates Smith Library

By MILDRED WYMAN
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — The Pride of Israel Synagogue last month dedicated a memorial library in honor of former synagogue president and devoted member Ben Smith.

The Pride of Israel Synagogue began as a mutual benefit society in 1905. Smith's father was one of the original members, and Smith grew with the shul.

Smith regularly attended Sabbath services with his father, absorbing the traditions and ritual of Judaism that remained with him all his life. As a young man he moved away, returning to Toronto in 1968. When his father died soon after, Smith arranged a minyan each morning and evening. At the end of that year of Kaddish, he was comitted to maintaining a permanent minyan. This paved the way for the religious program as it exists today.

In the following years, he acted whenever the need arose as shammas, baal tefillah, counsellor or procurer of supplies. He chaired the Annual Draw, often selling the most tickets, and was honored with wife Sally at the Israel Bond dinner in 1970.

He also conducted the auxiliary High Holiday services and was synagogue president from 1973 to 1974. He introduced the Tree of Life fundraising project, which now is mounted in the Bathurst Street synagogue's lobby.

Canadian group aims to help Ukrainian orphans

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — It is estimated that there are more than 50,000 children living in orphanages in Ukraine.

A group of Canadians is raising money and materials to help these orphans, many of whom are children who have been abandoned due to birth defects or because their parents are unable to support them. Other children were placed in orphanages by court order, victims of domestic violence, crime or parental alcohol addiction.

Help Us Help the Children, an affiliate of the Children of Chernobyl Canadian Fund, recently completed its sixth humanitarian aid mission to the Ukraine.

Ruslana Wrzesnewskyj, a Toronto volunteer with the organization, told The CJN that Help Us Help the Children is a voluntary non-profit charitable organization dedicated to improving the quality of life for children living in orphanages.

In 1992, two Canadian couples arrived in Ukraine in the hope of adopting a child. In their visits to orphanages, they discovered that these institutions, although orderly, clean and staffed with attentive and kind caregivers, suffered from severe shortages of food, clothing, and medication. These visits marked the beginning of Help Us Help the Children.

Throughout North America, Help Us Help the Children began collecting funds, infant formula, medications, food, clothing, medical and rehabilitation equipment, educational materials and toys.

In March, May and July, six groups of 10 people travelled a combined distance of 30,000 km to visit more than 35,000 children in 100 orphanages and 15 children's hospitals, rehabilitation centres and clinics. The institutions visited were supplied with primary medications, food, clothing, educational materials and toys. A grassroots approach to the delivery of humanitarian aid has been adopted, says Wrzesnewskyj.

"Over the past year we have personally delivered goods with a retail value of over $2.4 million Canadian," she says. A major trip is scheduled for November that will push that figure well over the $3 million mark.

She notes that in addition to private, institutional and corporate donations, Help Us Help the Children has received a $152,000 grant from the Canadian government and $32,000 from the Lyons Club in Geneva, Switzerland.

"This broader base of international support enables our group to continue providing humanitarian aid to the developing democratic state in a time of great need," she said.

She added that Ukrainian citizens face many economic hardships as a result of previous government policies and current demands on restructuring. "Children are particularly helpless in this situation," she said.

The Dnipropetrovsk Orphanage in Ukraine.

She added that a $1 donation is turned into $3 of purchasing power, and $15 supplies one child with medicine for one year.

An organization based in Ukraine, run by Ukrainian citizens, is responsible for needs assessment, distribution and inventory control. This has already been initiated.

"On our return visit, we noticed that the odor of diarrhea was absent, an indication that the children had become healthier," says Wrzesnewskyj. She notes that not one child has died in the last year.

Renaissance Hotel celebrates 10th year

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

JERUSALEM — This year, the Jerusalem Renaissance Hotel is 10 years old.

Over the years, guest rooms were added and a Grand Ballroom was opened. It seats 1,200 people banquet seating and 1,800 theatre style — the largest banqueting facility in any Israeli hotel.

Today, the Renaissance is the largest hotel in Israel with 650 guest rooms, 13 banquet rooms, a synagogue, a health club with professional Nautilus equipment, sauna, steam bath, huge Jacuzzi, the largest indoor hotel swimming pool in Jerusalem, a landscaped outdoor pool and children's pool, and a tennis court.

It is a conference centre which has become a favorite place for small and large simchahs.

The staff of 725 represents 29 countries, as well as sabras. Through a creative training program, the hotel gives new immigrants an opportunity to learn hotel skills. Recently, the hotel presented a course to train discharged soldiers in the theory and practice of skills needed to become a waiter.

For tourists as well as Israelis, it is an oasis of comfort and relaxation. The hotel provides meeting areas, facilities for business people and a place to relax after a busy day. To catch up on the news, there are a variety of cable television programs including CNN news in English.

The hotel also welcomes children. The staff are constantly on the lookout for programs and treats for the youngsters.

From the elegant Israeli buffet breakfast in a dining room that looks out to the pool area to the snack bar at the pool, throughout the building, the hotel is designed for people of all ages and religious persuasions.

For most visitors who traditionally stay in the downtown Jerusalem area, the Jerusalem Renaissance Hotel seems a bit out of the way. Located on Wolfson Street, it is a short walk to the Central Bus Station, the Knesset, the Israel Museum, the Bible Lands Museum and the Supreme Court. The hotel provides shuttle service to the Old City.

For those who drive, there is a convenient parking area for more than 400 cars, and there is no charge for parking.

During my recent visit, the Renaissance was filled with excitement as people arrived from around the world to attend a bar mitzvah in the hotel, while a wedding was taking place in the outside pool area.

Executive chef, Eli Fadida is famous for his superb presentations. The hotel features a rich variety of Jewish culinary food from different countries to symbolize the kibbutz galuyot in Israel — delicious food decorated as works of art. His menus include cosmopolitan, Chinese, Italian, French, Mediterranean, American and almost any kind of exotic cuisine.

Many extra features including table tennis, entertainment, lectures and fashion shows are planned throughout the year. And during the evening, guests enjoy a pianist playing background music that creates a mood of intimacy in the hotel's large spaces.

Package rates are available and Yiki Mula, the public relations manager says, "The longer you stay, the less you pay." She also notes that the program is flexible and the stay may be interrupted to allow side trips.

Ogopogo welcomes visitors to the Okanagan Valley

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to The CJN

OKANAGAN VALLEY — Partially devastated by forest fires this summer, the Okanagan Valley is normally a lush paradise of blossoming orchards, scenic lakes and mountains, and idyllic weather.

Located in the south-central interior of British Columbia, the region is hemmed in by the majestic Cascade Mountains that block most rainclouds from penetrating. As a result, it has more hours of clear blue skies than almost anywhere else in Canada.

September, for example, traditionally brings less than one inch of rainfall. Most of the valley is a richly fertile fruitbelt that produces apricots, apples, cherries, grapes, peaches and plums, but so scarce are rainclouds that desert-like conditions prevail in the southern extreme (near Vaseux Lake). In this area, prickly pear cactus and painted turtles are found.

Wine lovers appreciate the region's 17 wineries, which employ some 1,000 people and produce a variety of wines that are exported worldwide.

Like Scotland's fabled Loch Ness, the valley's Lake Okanagan is glacier-carved, and both lakes are long, deep and narrow, with roughly a north-south orientation. Another feature the two have in common is that both are home to legendary sea monsters.

Ogopogo is the name of the sea serpent that allegedly swims in Lake Okanagan. Over the years, witnesses have painted a composite portrait of a beast that is snake-like, greenish with brown spots, flat-headed (some have said the head is horse-like), and five to 25 meters in length. No such living animal is known to zoological science.

Not as internationally famous as the Loch Ness monster, Ogopogo has been making great strides since a local resident claimed to have caught it on videotape about five years ago.

Although the four-minute home video is inconclusive (is that an otter, beaver or serpent?), it has generated renewed interest in the decades-old legend of Ogopogo and inspired visits from TV crews as far away as Japan.

While Ogopogo's existence may never be satisfactorily demonstrated, its legend has grown large as life. Indeed, the serpent has become a sort of unofficial mascot for the valley, and is often depicted on maps as a contented creature swimming in plain view on the lake. Over the years, Ogopogo has likewise swum into the affections of residents and visitors alike.

TRAVEL TALK

By BILL GLADSTONE

Mysteries of the Wall Revealed: For the first time in more than 2,000 years, Jerusalem's entire Western Wall is available for viewing.

The wall, Judaism's holiest site, is the only surviving remnant of the Second Temple. There's both an exposed portion of the Wall and a hidden section that experts have been uncovering since 1967.

Now, visitors may trek beside all 490 meters of the wall, and inspect sections of an 8-metre tall water tunnel the ancient Israelites carved out of solid rock more than two millenia ago. The tunnel runs from a pool near the Damascus Gate to the northern corner of the Temple Mount, a distance of about 80 meters. It was excavated a century ago by a British archaeologist, then resealed. Israeli experts recently found it by accident during some routine digging.

In recent years excavators have developed fresh insights into some Western Wall mysteries, but continue to grope for answers to others. No one yet understands, for example, how enormous stones, each weighing more than 300 tons, were transported to the Temple site.

Several companies offer tours of the Western Wall tunnels; these must be booked well in advance. For further information, call 011-972-2-271333, or contact the Israel Government Tourist Office, (416) 964-3784, fax (416) 964-2420, toll-free 1-800-669-2369.

Travel Scams: Uniglobe Advantage Travel Group, which claims to be the world's largest travel franchise organization, recently conducted a three-month investigation into various types of travel fraud.

"Travel fraud is a $12-billion a year industry dedicated to separating consumers from their hard-earned cash and providing nothing in return," said Uniglobe owner Michael Merrithew.

He said a typical scam is convincing victims to pay a deposit of several hundred dollars for their trip. The date of the trip is postponed several times and "by the time the victim catches on, the scammer is long gone with his or her money."

Travel scams

Some 500 companies offer sophisticated vacation schemes in Ontario alone, according to Merrithew. Travel fraud operators may hide behind bankruptcy laws to keep their companies afloat, he said, or avoid detection by slightly altering their corporate names. He said senior citizens and youth are prime targets for scams, and victims of prior scams may be approached and told their lost money is recoverable for a small fee.

The easiest way to avoid being ripped-off is to deal with a legitimate travel agent you trust, Merrithew advised. If you are offered a vacation as a prize, ask for written material that sets out costs you will have to bear. These could include deposits, registration fees, membership fees and port taxes. Beware of vague promises, such as "major hotels" or "major airlines." If you're still unsure after receiving written material, ask your travel agent for advice.

A tip-sheet outlining how to avoid becoming a victim of travel fraud is available free at any Uniglobe office.

Roseanne Sets The Record Straight: Like Cher and Madonna, Roseanne Arnold now goes by a singular appellation — Roseanne.

As a young girl, the Salt Lake City-born comedienne would entertain family members gathered in her grandmother's apartment for Sabbath dinner. Her eponymous TV series, which debuted six years ago on ABC, continues to be one of the top-rated series on television.

The former Mrs. Tom Arnold intends to "set the record straight" regarding her childhood, her father's abuse, her rise to stardom and her controversial relationships. If you appreciate Roseanne's irreverent, self-deprecating wit, you may enjoy her Toronto appearance at Roy Thomson Hall on Sunday Oct. 23 at 7.30 p.m. Tickets ($20 to $45) are available through the box office or by calling (416) 872-4255.

Father's tragedy spurs author on

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — When radiologist Peter Samu's father committed suicide several years ago, he decided to deliver the eulogy himself and describe his father's life and the events leading to the tragedy. He was asked by friends to put his story on paper.

When a friend, Thomas Verny, a Toronto psychiatrist and author of five books including the best-selling Secret Life of The Unborn Child, read the story, Verny recalls, "It brought tears to my eyes several times."

When Verny suggested that Samu look for a publisher for his short story, Samu replied, "No, who would ever want to read it?"

Verny says he couldn't put Samu's story out of his mind and finally decided to publish a book of short stories about fathers and grandfathers written by their own sons and daughters.

The idea led to the recent publication of the anthology, Gifts of Our Fathers: Heartfelt Remembrances of Fathers and Grandfathers, published in Canada by Fitzhenry & Whiteside.

The short stories and poems tell of good relationships, painful relationships, unrequited love, and soul wrenching revelations from now-grown children using remembrance to come to grips with the actions and motivations that drove them towards or apart from their fathers and grandfathers.

"Fathers and grandfathers seem to bestow upon their children both precious gifts and painful wounds," notes Verny. He says that men have been getting a lot of bad press lately. And deservedly so.

"However," he adds, "it seems to me that for every man who abuses children, violates women and pollutes the environment, there are countless others who love, nurture and support their families, friends and fellow human beings. Perhaps it's time men and women be reminded of that."

Verny, 58, father of two and grandfather of one, focuses on the positive aspects of these relationships.

When Verny advertised in Canadian and U.S. publications last year, inviting writers to submit short stories and poems focusing on their fathers and grandfathers, he was overwhelmed by the hundreds of submissions he received. He narrowed them down to 35 and his California publisher, Crossing Press, chose 28.

Some of those selected are by experience writers such as Robert Bly, Maria Mazziotti Gillan and Peter Such, while others have not been published before.

Reading the stories and poems in Gifts helps the reader sort out many of the mysteries that people try to unravel in complex relationships. The book gives new, honest insights into each person's own history — males and females — and it stirs almost-forgotten memories.

Many mysteries

These tales of fathers and grandfathers also reveal a great deal about the writers. Threaded through Samu's well-written reflections and his search for the reason for his father's jump from a balcony at age 88, are glimpses of the son whose life has been strewn with upheaval and wandering. In 13 pages, Samu unfolds the intertwining characters who shaped his life.

Born in Cluj, Romania, (Transylvania), Samu lived in Budapest, hid on a farm in Gyomro, Hungary, during the war, then lived in Prague; the family got out as Catholics, moved to Venezuela, then to Barbados, and finally came to Canada.

Samu received a medical degree at the University of Toronto, did a radiology residency at Stanford University in California, and is presently in private practice in radiology.

Verny says he hopes that one of the results of this anthology will be to help children heal their wounds and come to grips with their past by bringing understanding of fathers and grandfathers.

Vision TV plans shows on High Holy Days

By RON CSILLAG
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Vision TV says it will try to avoid airing programs of Jewish interest at times when observant Jews cannot watch them — just as it has done for September.

Vision has scheduled several programs this month on Jewish themes, but all fall on religious days, preventing their viewing by shomer Shabbat Jews.

Both Sides of the Wire, a documentary on European Jews who were interned at a special camp near Fredericton during World War II, was slated to air Friday, Sept. 2 at 8 p.m., eastern time (Shabbat). The program was scheduled for rebroadcast on Monday, Sept. 5 at 11 a.m. and 4 p.m., eastern time.

Forgiving Harry, the story of two brothers who end a long feud on Yom Kippur, was scheduled to air Sept. 6 at 10:30 p.m. and Sept. 7 at 1:30 p.m. and 6:30 p.m. Rosh Hashanah falls on those two days.

What is a Jew?, a look at the Lubavitch movement, was also slated for broadcast Sept. 6 and 7.

The observant would also not be able to view Ritual: Three Portraits of Jewish Life, a documentary on the origins of prayerbooks, Sukkot and the bris, because it will be aired Sept. 27 at 8 p.m. (Shemini Atzeret) and on Sept. 28 at 11 a.m. and 4 p.m. (Simchat Torah).

Vision TV is aware of the scheduling conflicts and is "very sensitive to this sort of thing," spokeswoman Ellie Skrow told The CJN.

Skrow said all the shows in question have aired before and will be broadcast again in the future.

It was Vision TV's intent to "highlight" September's Jewish holidays by going heavy on Jewish content. "Because there are so many holy days, it was very hard to program without hitting one of them," she added.

Vision is hoping non-observant Jews will watch the shows, while for the observant, "taping is an option," Skrow said.

She said the network "will try to avoid" similar conflicts in the future.

In the meantime, Vision is scheduling more programs on Jewish themes, Skrow noted.

The Longest Hatred, an acclaimed three-part series on anti-Semitism, will air Oct. 11, 18 and 27 at 8 p.m.

In Search of Holy England, a five-part series tracing the personal spiritual development of Britain's Rabbi Lionel Blue, will be broadcast on successive Tuesdays at 9 p.m., starting Oct. 11.

'66 Was a Good Year for Tourism, a hit at this year's Jewish Film Festival, will air Friday Oct. 21 at 9 p.m. and Monday Oct. 24, time TBA.

And the BBC feature film Bar Mitzvah Boy will be broadcast Dec. 1 at 9 p.m.

Books

By BERNARD BASKIN

The Reviewer's Task

With the new year 5755 I look back with unfeigned astonishment at 26 (or is it 27?) years of continuous reviewing of books for The CJN and its predecessor.

From time to time I am asked how I regard my task and function. Some persons hold that the primary purpose of reviews is to provide consumer information on the content and quality of books so that readers can make decisions about whether to buy — or at least to read them.

Naturally, reviews must summarize the contents of the book and based on that report, a reader may decide to purchase or not. But this is very much a secondary concern of mine. I know from long experience that the vast majority of book review readers are not going to be purchasers. This truth is quickly confirmed from my discussion with book sellers. Of course, reviews do sell some books — and Jews, in proportion buy more books than any other group — but not to a large or encouraging degree.

If this is the case, then the review has another reason for being. It stands as an independent piece of writing. Indeed, my aim has always been to emphasize information or ideas contained in the book — apart from the quality of the writing or other literary concerns — so that the reader may be informed, edified and entertained.

During the past month, for example, readers of this column learned about some aspects of Jewish mysticism, the life and contributions of Albert Einstein, the abortive Franklin expedition to Canada and the singularity of Oscar Levant.

The reviewer's work then, properly understood, is no less original than that of the writer he is reviewing.

More books are being published today than ever before in history and more reasonably good books have been published in our time than in all previous times together. That is what is so exciting — and so baffling — about trying to sort them out. Which book shall be reviewed? Which ones should we read? With so many worthwhile books available it is inevitable that others are ignored or shunted aside. What is happening today is akin to what happened in Renaissance Europe which produced — believe it or not — 300,000 sonnets.

One would think that the proliferation of good books would force inferior ones into oblivion. Unhappily, this is not the case. Gersham's Law seems to prevail with books as with money: bad books drive out the good. Our age provides more and better books to choose from and it produces more educated people, but it has not yet provided a better average of general taste. Moreover, the space that is devoted to information about books is usually extremely limited — and this is true for The CJN and most similar publications.

There is also the growing fear that sophisticated technology will soon render the book obsolete, Is the book as an object on its last legs? Is its demise demise inevitable?

Only time will tell, but meanwhile the new year is a good time to reflect on our Jewish kinship to the book. Cecil Roth wrote: "To an extent unequalled among other sections of humanity, Jews have been interested in books . . . (The Jew) copied books. He owned books. He patronized literature. He was interested in intellectual life and . . . and movements. Even in the most soul-destroying period of oppression, it might be assumed that almost every ghetto Jew, however humble his circumstances and however lowly his calling, was likely to have his modest library. A book was not to him, as to his neighbor, an object of veneration, of mystery, of distrust. It was sheer necessity of everyday life."

Books remain the gateway to wisdom and as the Midrash reminds us, "If you acquire wisdom, what do you lack; if you lack wisdom, what do you have?"

Documentary looks at concentration camps

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
CJN Staff Reporter

Harriet Wichin's "landscapes of inhumanity" leave a viewer sad and sober.

Her poetic documentary, Silent Witness, which will be screened at the Toronto International Film Festival on Sept. 11 and 12, is a meditation on two concentration camps transformed into memorials, Dachau and Auschwitz.

The overarching issue is how these places of degradation and death can best be preserved for future generations.

Should they be left in their original state? Or should they be so prettified that they conceal the horror of the Holocaust?

In Dachau's case, the question already has been settled. Dachau, the first German concentration camp, is a pale replica of its former self, as Wichin ruefully suggests. Only a small part of the original camp is open to visitors, and what is shown has been sanitized.

Auschwitz and particularly its annex, Birkenau, present a more realistic and graphic picture of the satanic camp culture.

Mounds of shoes, suitcases and eye glasses — the detrius of the dead — confront visitors as they pass through on their pilgrimages.

And who can forget the stagnant pond grey with the ashes of the murdered?

Wichin interviews the curators of memory, the people who work at the memorials, a Polish survivor, a Jewish survivor, an ethnic German living in Poland and Carmelite nuns.

With considerable skill, she integrates their poignant observations and commentaries with sombre views of Dachau and Auschwitz on grey, foggy days.

The Pole, a man who has come to terms with his mortality, never really left Auschwitz. Imprisoned there during the war, he has worked in its museum from the beginning.

Auschwitz, for him, is not just a memorial, but an "experience." Auschwitz, he warns, should not be changed, else history will be falsified and Holocaust deniers will win a victory.

The camera follows him to the site of a warehouse which once bulged with the possessions of doomed inmates. It was known as Kanada. The Nazis blew it up, leaving nothing but a charred tree on the spot. It is a perfect metaphor.

In Auschwitz, Wichin also speaks to a tour guide who's worked there for more than two decades. She is a German woman, married to a Pole, who remained in Silesia after the war.

She is ashamed of the crimes Germany perpetrated. She leads us to what she feel is the saddest place in Auschwitz — the children's barrack. Words are not enough. One can imagine the heartrending scenes which unfolded after these innocent victims were torn from their parents' grasp.

Will be screened at International Film Festival

In Dachau, Wichin talks with a Hungarian Jewish woman who settled in Munich after the war. She is an immensely sensitive person, as befits someone who relates her story of survival to young German visitors in organized discussions.

Rightly or wrongly, she doubts whether the powers-that-be really want to preserve Dachau. For them, she claims, a plain stone monument would be sufficient.

Wichin seems ambivalent about the Carmelite nuns in Dachau. They pray for the dead and are clearly sincere, dedicated souls. But in a sense, their presence obscures the Vatican's virtual silence during the Holocaust.

And the Carmelite sisters who built a chapel in Auschwitz, before being forced to vacate it by the Pope himself, did more harm than good.

Wichin's observations transcend the bounds of Dachau and Auschwitz. They pose pertinent and unsettling questions about the nature of preservation and memory. Silent Witness, which is dedicated to her mother and father, speaks the language of eloquence.

Henry's is focusing on current prosperity

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Henry's has attracted photo enthusiasts for over 30 years. This third-generation family business is the largest independent photographic retailer in the country. And business is booming.

During the past recession, sales actually increased. Last year the store did a major renovation, expanding the retail space from 6,000 to 11,000 square feet.

The company's current prosperity belies its troubled past.

Henry's didn't start out as a camera store . . . it didn't even start out as Henry's. In 1909 Harry Stein opened a jewelry store in the west end of Toronto. His customers kept confusing the name Harry with Henry and the name stuck.

Harry's son, Gerry, went into the family business, which was also a pawn shop, but by the late '50s Gerry Stein no longer saw a future in jewelry. When the Japanese started making cameras he had a hunch there would be a big market for them.

He began selling cameras in 1958. By the mid '60s, photographic supplies had become the mainstay of the business.

When Gerry Stein's health deteriorated in the late 60s — he died in 1975 — he asked his son, Andy, and his future son-in-law, Mark Wolfson, to run the business.

The two bought it in 1971 and moved it to its present location at Queen and Church, in 1974.

"The store was an instant success," said Wolfson.

They expanded, opening five more retail locations and a wholesale distributing division. They also purchased a photo finishing company with 50 retail outlets. It (buying this company) was a bad business decision, said Andy Stein, the president of Henry's. "We overexpanded when the first recession hit."

They tried to scale back their operations, but they couldn't downsize fast enough, Wolfson said, and the company went bankrupt.

Henry's was located at 113 Queen Street from 1944 to 1963.

"We were devastated by the bankruptcy," he said. "It still hurts me to talk about it."

After the bankruptcy, Wolfson opened Steeles Camera, a retail outlet at Steeles and Yonge.

Stein said the bankruptcy was a very important learning experience. When he re-opened the store, he decided to keep the operation simple by focusing on retail. His suppliers gave him credit; he started small and with "a lot of hard work" he was able to get the business back on track.

Stein told The CJN he also bought back the name "Henry's" from the trustee because it was the store's main asset. "The store and the name had a following," he said.

Retail, which includes new, used and refurbished equipment, continues to be the backbone of the business. But the industrial department — it supplies camera and video equipment to corporations and institutions — makes up about 25 to 30 per cent of Henry's annual sales.

Digital imaging, the latest in photographic technology is a new area of business. The new generation of cameras captures the image on a computer chip instead of film.

"It's just starting to become a consumer product," Stein said. He expects sales in digital imaging products to parallel those in video.

Henry's stocked video equipment in the late '70s, but they only sold one or two cameras a month — they were over $3,000 each — because they were expensive, he said. But with today's lower prices they sell thousands. Video equipment now makes up 30 per cent of sales, he said.

Today, Stein spends most of his time buying. He said he keeps in close touch with his suppliers so he can get extra special deals. "We try to find merchandise that's different or end of the line. Something we can offer at exceptional values."

He said business is going well because he learned from his past mistakes. "You control your costs carefully; you don't pull back on advertising, you turn your inventory quickly and move anything that's not selling," he said.

"We can make fast decisions because we're concentrated in only two locations," but Henry's is also big enough to get good deals from suppliers, he said. "That's the reason for staying at this size."

By 1986 there was enough money in Henry's coffers for Stein to repurchase the 16,000-square-foot building which houses the store and warehouse.

But Steeles Camera never really took off. It was converted to a Henry's in 1991 when Stein bought out his brother-in-law.

Today, Wolfson manages the downtown store. "When we had the Steeles sign up people drove by and didn't notice us," he said. "But once the Henry's sign went up the traffic increased because of the magic of the name."

U.S. Bonds' president outlines expansion plans

Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

NEW YORK — After closing 15 offices in the United States in recent years, the new president of State of Israel Bonds now plans to expand operations.

"Step by step, within the existing resources, we are going to move into areas that were closed up," said Nathan Sharony, who became president and chief executive officer of the organization earlier this year.

This shift exemplifies the dual nature of Israel Bonds, as both an agent of the Israeli Finance Ministry and as a Jewish organization.

It was fiscally prudent to close offices that had overheads of as much as eight per cent of the amount they raised. But expanding the links between Israel and the Diaspora, said Sharony, is worth the cost, "way beyond the dollars and cents.

"I don't know how to quantify the weight of it, but I do know it carries some weight — sometimes very little, sometimes a lot."

Gary Tobin, director of the Cohen Centre for Jewish Studies of Brandeis University, agreed that building the connection was important.

"What does it mean for an 18-year-old or a 16-year-old to buy a $25 or $50 or $100 bond? Its value is more than just the dollar amount purchased," said Tobin, who has written extensively on Jewish philanthropy.

Sharony, who is based in New York, said the increased emphasis on promoting a Jewish connection to Israel will be reflected in the mix of investment vehicles that Bonds will be selling.

Last year, about 60 per cent of the $1 billion raised by Bonds was in the form of notes, high-denomination private placement of Israeli debts.

This year, that will decline to 40 per cent, as the Bonds organization pushes the lower-denomination bonds with hopes of reaching "many more Jews," said Sharony.

"We are pushing our people in the field to do more sales to individuals," he said.

And as part of this thrust, Sharony has reopened an office in western Florida and plans to open another office in the United States this year.

The new branches will be financed by redirecting his existing budget.

But to open as many offices as Sharony would like will require the Israeli government "to increase our allocation of the budget," he said — a process he believes will happen gradually.

But Sharony's expansion plans come against a backdrop of calls in Israel for major reform of the Bonds organization.

Bonds has been coming under increasing scrutiny for how it spends its money, and whether the money the government allocates it is the most cost-effective way to raise capital.

In response to a recent increase in the Bonds' interest rate, the Israeli daily newspaper Hatzofeh last month again raised questions about the organization.

The connection between the Bonds and Israel is important, said the paper in an editorial, but this does not mean the Israeli government should pay higher interest for notes sold through the organization when it could raise the money at lower cost.

To prevent spending too much on the capital raised by Bonds, the Israeli Treasury last year put a cap on Bonds sales. It authorized the sale of about $1 billion's worth annually. After raising $1.2 billion in 1992, Bonds raised $1.06 billion in 1993.

A bill introduced by Likud Knesset member Meir Shetreet to reform and possibly eliminate the Bonds organization passed its first reading in the Knesset last year. It now awaits deliberation in the Knesset Finance Committee.

"I really don't know what pushes him to say what he says," said Sharony of Shetreet. "Because I think if you do a thorough analysis of what takes place here, he will change much of what he says here. Whether he did a thorough analysis or not, I have a tendency to believe he did not."

Sharony came to Israel Bonds after a typically Israeli career in the military, in industry and in government service. He concluded 30 years in the Israel Defense Force in 1982 as a major general, having headed the planning division.

Yogen Früz goes public to obtain expansion funds

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Sam Serruya thought his sons would work for him and eventually take over his typesetting company.

Michael, 30, had even trained in computer graphics to prepare himself for the family business. But he got side-tracked and, with his brother Aaron, 28, started Yogen Früz, a chain of frozen yogurt outlets. They opened their first store in 1986. Two years later there were 30 stores.

Today, there are 360 outlets worldwide. The company's annual sales for 1993 was $70 million. And now it's on the verge of going public.

With the success of Yogen Früz there was no need for Sam Serruya to hold on to his printing business. He sold it and retired. But his sons needed his expertise on the international front so now he works for them.

A $300,000 loan from their father gave Michael and Aaron the start-up capital for Yogen Früz. They opened up their first store in The Promenade in Thornhill. "We waited a long time to get a mall location," Aaron told The CJN.

He said a mall was the best venue for selling frozen yogurt all year round. Michael said that from the start they planned to franchise Yogen Früz.

They sold master or territorial franchises for all the provinces outside of Ontario, some Northeastern states, and for individual countries once they expanded their international operations. They have since bought back all but one of the Canadian master-franchises. For every dollar sold, the Serruyas make six cents on royalties from franchises and two cents from master-franchises.

The first Yogen Früz store opened about a year before Zacks and TCBY, two big American frozen yogurt chains, set up in Canada. Baskin-Robbins also got on the frozen yogurt band wagon with Yogurty's.

Yogen Früz was up against some heavyweight competition. But when the dust settled it was the only major frozen yogurt chain in Canada to survive. "We won the yogurt wars," Aaron said.

In 1985 when the Serruyas were first interested in selling frozen yogurt, they approached TCBY and Zacks about bringing their product to Canada. But they were turned down. The big companies weren't ready to expand here. And that turned out to be a blessing in disguise for the Serruyas.

Both TCBY and Zacks bombed in Canada. They didn't understand the Canadian market, Aaron said. They wanted strip mall locations like they had in the United States, but selling a frozen product in outdoor stores during the winter was disastrous for them. There are no Zacks and very few TCBYs left in Ontario.

Two years ago the Serruyas bought out Yogurty's, their remaining competitor. "We made our money back in a year. They lost [Baskin-Robbins] $8 million," Aaron said.

The company has since expanded into non-traditional locations by "piggy backing" — setting up a shop within a shop — with Country Style Donuts. "We don't really like a street location. But this is a joint venture," Aaron said.

The coffee and donuts are a good match for the yogurt business, Michael said. "It levels out the sales for the store for the entire day. Sixty per cent of their (donut and coffee) business is done in the morning. When they slack off we pick up."

But it's the international operations that have really put Yogen Früz on the map. Michael said they had initially planned to expand their U.S. operations, but they couldn't get choice locations because Yogen Früz had not built up a reputation in the U.S. So they turned their attention to Europe and Latin America.

The Serruyas made important international contacts when they attended several international food trade shows with their father whose experience and linguistic skills were invaluable, they said.

Aaron and Michael have carved up the globe: Aaron is responsible for Latin America and Asia, and Michael takes care of Europe. Before they go to a particular country they work with the foreign affairs department to find sources to manufacture their product. Most of their franchisees get their products locally.

The Serruyas have also introduced frozen yogurt in many Asian countries. "When we first opened in Jakarta we couldn't give it away," Aaron said. But he said Indonesia is now one of the "hottest" franchises — they've opened 12 shops in less than two years and each averages $300,000 in annual sales.

He said Yogen Früz is even more popular in Latin America where the stores sell three times the volume of their Canadian counterparts. He attributes this to the warmer weather year round, and lack of competition. In Asia, Yogen Früz stores do twice the volume of the Canadian stores, he added.

The Serruyas said the master franchisees in these countries tend to be wealthy members of the establishment. For example, the master franchisee in Thailand is spending millions of dollars just to purchase the real estate for the stores in Bangkok, because there are no retail rental properties. The Serruyas said the master franchisees do a better job than they could do because they're on their own turf; they know their own market.

The Serruyas see their master franchisees as a base for expanding other food franchises worldwide. Michael said that he and Aaron have the contacts and the know-how to put other Canadian fast food franchises on the internal map. (He wouldn't say which ones).

That's why Yogen Früz is going public. The company is debt-free, but the Serruyas need the infusion of capital for acquisitions, he said. When the shares go on the market the family will retain 67 per cent of the company. "This company is poised for major growth, Aaron said. "We're opening two or three stores every week somewhere around the world."

When asked what Sam Serruya thinks of his sons' accomplishments Michael said his father is a man of few words, but he's proud of them.

He said, "There's a certain satisfaction that you derive as an entire family when you build a successful business together."

TORONTO — Do you like the sound of your voice? If not, what are you doing about it? Very often people will say, "What can I do? I can't change it." Yes, you can.

Voices that are too loud or too soft, nasal, breathy, guttural, monotone, or hoarse; speech that is slurred or flat or uses careless diction and pronunciation; even speech with an unfamiliar accent — all can be improved.

By following a set of exercises and diligently practising them, you can improve your speech and become more successful in both your business and social relationships.

No matter what your vocation, good oral communication is vital for advancement, be it in sales, teaching, the professions, on the shop floor or in upper management.

Similarly, in your personal life — among family and friends, at PTA meetings, at social gatherings or in romantic situations — the ability to speak with clarity and confidence will enable you to make the kind of vocal impact you always wanted to, but thought was exclusive to others like stage, film and television performers.

The formula for improving the quality of your voice and speech includes relaxation, abdominal or deep breathing, physical exercises and posture. A relaxed body means there is no constriction in the stomach, chest, throat, jaws and lips.

Deep breathing makes full use of the lungs when inhaling oxygen and at the same time flexes the diaphragm muscle. In contrast, shallow breathing causes the individual to breathe from the chest, working twice as hard raising and lowering the chest when inhaling and exhaling.

Shallow breathers often have high-pitched thin voices, whereas deep breathers will have low-pitched mellow voices. Shallow breathers are more prone to sore throats, hoarseness, and voice loss.

Babies are natural deep breathers. That is why they are able to yell and scream for hours with their tiny lungs without having laryngitis, unlike adults who do the same at sports events or in noisy discos.

The physical exercises are designed so that the rib cage moves freely with the expansion of the lungs, and the neck, jaws, lips, tongue and soft palate are strong and flexible for crystal-clear articulation.

Straight body posture is not only important for appearance, but a correct spinal alignment permits the vocal organs freedom of movement within the torso and head.

Once the mechanics of voice production have been perfected, you can begin to concentrate on the other building blocks for speech improvement: pronunciation, resonance, pitch, projection, intonation, word rate, phrasing, and expression. An awareness and careful use of these elements when speaking will be of inestimable value to your self-esteem.

In addition, a good vocabulary and avoidance of repetitious words (okay, y'know, y'see) and sound fillers (umm, ahhh) will make for a more colorful speech.

Correct pronounciation of words is another factor in making a good impression with your speech (Toronto, not Tarana or Torono; library, not libary; February, not Febry). Don't omit the letters in the middle or end of a word (goin', comin').

Caring people always want to make a good visual impression. If you also make a good impression vocally and verbally, it will be three times as valuable. Go for it!

Ontario and Israeli officials sign a pact of economic cooperation

By LEORA FRUCHT
CJN Israel Correspondent

JERUSALEM — A small step towards improving Canadian-Israeli trade was taken this month with the signing of a memorandum of understanding on economic cooperation between Israel and Ontario.

The agreement, signed by Ontario Premier Bob Rae and Israeli Industry and Trade Minister Micha Harish, is intended to identify potential areas for bilateral trade and increase awareness of business opportunities in Ontario and Israel.

Meanwhile, Canadian officials arrived in Israel last week to determine the feasability of a fullfledged Canada-Israel free trade agreement. Officials will report their findings to cabinet, which is to discuss the issue in mid-September.

Bilateral trade — which totalled about $200 million in 1993 — is hampered by high tariffs which make Canadian exports to Israel uneconomical. Israel already has free trade agreements with the United States and European Community, putting Canadian products at a disadvantage.

The memorandum of understanding — the first such agreement between Israel and a Canadian province — undertakes to promote a free trade agreement, but does not in itself remove any trade barriers. However, it may help overcome a second obstacle to bilateral trade: lack of awareness.

Encourages joint ventures

"Israelis know what the United States has to offer. But they know very little about Canada," said an official at Israel's Ministry of Industry and Trade. "Simply acquainting Israelis with the Canadian market may encourage joint ventures."

Towards that end, the agreement calls for a Doing Business in Ontario seminar for Israeli companies to be held later this year. The memorandum also commits both sides to exchange information on business opportunities, identify cooperative projects for small- and medium-sized companies, and locate partners for high-tech ventures in energy, telecommunications, medical equipment, aviation, space and construction, as well as agricultural, hydro and environmental projects.

"The memorandum is one way of showing Canadian business people that the governments of Ontario and Canada support trade with Israel," said Sarah Hradecky, trade commissioner at the Canadian Embassy in Israel.

The agreement was drafted following Rae's visit to Israel in December. Rae, a firm proponent of free trade with Israel, led a delegation of Ontario business representatives in a bid to promote closer economic links.

Israel's Ministry of Industry and Trade is exploring the possibility of signing similar trade agreements with other provinces, said a ministry official.

Canadian exports to Israel rose by 33 per cent in the first half of 1994, reaching $66.4 million. Pulp and paper, metals, machinery and mineral products were the major Canadian items imported by Israel. Israeli exports to Canada — mainly diamonds, agricultural products and machinery — totalled $47 million during the same period — a slight drop over the preceding year.

This week The CJN features . . . Rick Levine Band

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — When planning a party or simchah, choosing the right band is of the utmost importance, says Rick Levine who formed the Rick Levine Band in 1982.

"Musical tastes can be very subjective, and what sounds good to one person may sound different to another."

Levine's advice to anyone planning an event is that if your experience in music is limited. "It would be a good idea to find a person with some musical knowledge who is willing to help you in making the musical selection."

He notes that some bands offer a special selection of show type material which is usually performed during the dinner portion of the evening.

The size of the band is important and should be chosen according to the size of the guest list.

Whenever possible, a minimum of two performers should be engaged for versatility. To achieve a true musical dimension, a minimum dance combination should be comprised of bass guitar, drums and a piano.

"A vocalist adds variety and personality to music," says Levine. "And if you are planning to have more than 100 guests, you should consider a fifth piece — and six to eight musicians with 150 people or more.

"In most cases, a good band doesn't come cheap," he says. The going rate should reflect the size, quality, and reputation of the band.

He suggests that it is wise to shop around. Before selecting your musical group, try to hear the band at a function or go to a rehearsal where the band can spend more time going through a variety of tunes just for you.

The Rick Levine Band recently played at the Tu b'Av Festival at the Jewish Community Centre and Levine will be featured at the annual Terry Fox Run in September. Along with numerous other community events, Levine organizes and promotes the annual We're Having a Party event which takes place at Temple Sinai every January.

Levine believes the band leader is the key to your musical direction. "Find a person who has the experience, confidence and desire to make your party a success — someone you can trust," he advises.

He says that often it is the music that can make or break the party. "Like a good location, the number of good bands around is limited; therefore it is advisable to start looking early."

He emphasizes that you should be suspicious of a band that constantly plays extremely loud music.

Levine's current project is Times Square Entertainment Group. "Reflecting the musical and entertainment trends of the '90s, I've brought together a sensational high energy package that is very popular in the New York City area," he says.

"It is the first of its kind in Canada. It is a synthesis of live entertainment and interactive high energy disc jockey music complete with dynamic dances, incredible laser lighting and special effects."

High-Class Hookers Hooked?

TEL AVIV — High-class prostitutes who until now have enjoyed tax-free earnings may be forced to declare their income to authorities, tax sources said.

One such woman, who said she has worked for Tel Aviv escort agencies for the past three years, complained that if she had to register with tax authorities she would also demand social benefits.

"If I have to pay tax on my earnings, then authorities should also ensure I get proper health care services and other social benefits," said Rahel, who added she earns from NIS 200 - NIS 500 ($65 - $165) per client, usually visiting them in their hotel rooms.

The move follows recent raids by tax officials on Tel Aviv escort agencies. Owners of such agencies, said investigators, have defrauded tax authorities out of millions of shekels.

"Every escort agency in the city will be investigated, and owners will have to start paying taxes, just as other companies do," said a tax official.

Border Produce Market Proposed

JERUSALEM — The Agriculture Ministry has presented Jordanian representatives at the peace talks with a proposal to establish an $82.4 million produce market at one of the planned Israel-Jordan border crossings.

Agriculture Ministry director Yonatan Basi said the Beit She'an area would be given priority as the location for the project, one of several proposals presented to the Jordanians for joint agricultural projects. Beit She'an is halfway between Haifa in Israel and Irbid in Jordan.

Israel has further suggested the establishment of a training farm for demonstration of Israeli-developed agricultural methods and technologies. The estimated cost of establishing the facility is $10 million.

Also on the table are joint projects in soil erosion management, waste water irrigation, flood control, veterinary activity, and environmental protection projects. The estimated cost of the joint projects is $100 million.

The Manufacturers' Association has suggested that trade stations be established alongside Israel-Jordan border crossings in order to encourage joint economic activity. The proposed stations would be outfitted with exhibition space, a database and information network, and a distribution and transport centre including duty areas and other services.

Imports Consumption Surge

JERUSALEM — The Treasury updated its import and consumption estimates for this year, following the surge in imports and the significant rise in private consumption during the first half of the year.

According to the Treasury's economic department, imports will increase 10 per cent, instead of 5.9 per cent, as it previously estimated, and private consumption will grow five per cent instead of four per cent.

Imports, excluding military goods, jumped 14 per cent during the first half of the year and were 15 per cent higher than last year's average.

During the second quarter of the year, imports rose 10 per cent, following a 7.5 per cent increase in the previous quarter. The jump in the second quarter mostly reflects rising fuel, diamond, ship and airplane imports, as well as a surge in tourism abroad.

Private consumption rose seven per cent during the first half and was nine per cent higher than last year's average, representing a seven per cent increase per capita. In the first quarter, private consumption expanded 5.4 per cent, followed by an 1.3 per cent increase in the second quarter.

Treasury economists note that despite the jump in consumer spending, private consumption is not the engine driving the economy forward. Rather exports and investments are pushing the economy ahead.

During the first half of the year, investments shot up 16 per cent. Investment in machinery and equipment increased 17 per cent and investment on land transportation rose 24 per cent.

Unemployment Down

JERUSALEM — Unemployment fell to 7.8 per cent in the second quarter of the year, compared with 8.2 per cent in the previous quarter, the Central Bureau of Statistics reported.

Male unemployment dropped to six per cent from 6.3 per cent in the previous quarter, while female unemployment was significantly higher at 10.2 per cent.

The number of new jobs jumped by 136,000, and the number of unemployed dropped by 37,000. The increase in new jobs represents a 7.9 per cent rise over new jobs created in the second quarter of last year, while the number of the jobless fell dramatically by 19.8 per cent during the same period.

During the first half of the year, the unemployment rate fell to eight per cent compared to 9.4 per cent in the previous six months.

Sun always shines on Joy Cherry bridal parade

If you've never walked on Cloud Nine, a visit to Joy Cherry's bridal salon will get you airborne in a hurry. Just bring a vision of your dream dress; airfare and other amenities are Joy-ously supplied.

The steps to Joy's second-floor salon are a staircase to bridal heaven. Decorated in dreamy peach and salmon tones, the room is awash in natural light thanks to a massive skylight. Uplifting on a dreary day, breathtaking on a sunny one, the room also offers a distinct advantage: you can view your dress under both natural and artificial light.

In this tastefully appointed and comfortably furnished "living room environment", bridal consultant Carol Gold will take as much time as needed to help you translate your vision into a reality. You'll choose from collections by Vera Wang, Christos, Priscilla of Boston, and Jim Helm. Most gowns can be ordered in a wide range of sizes, and fuller cuts are available. Two expert bridal-only seamstresses are on the premises at all times to ensure a perfect fit.

When your gown is ready for fitting, you'll try it on in the oversized dressing room. Almost boudoirish in comfort, this room's ample mirrors and padded bench (with a baker's dozen bridal shoes tucked underneath) allow you to enjoy your first impressions in exquisite privacy while your fiancé, mother and – oh why not, your bubie – wait outside with baited breath.

When you're good and ready, you'll emerge into the natural light and mount a few steps to a small stage flanked by floor-to-ceiling mirrors which give you an all-angles view of your dress.

Once you and your entourage are satisfied that this is, indeed, your dream dress, it's time to accessorize; and here, there's an embarrassment of riches. Lovely veils, hand-made porcelain headpieces, porcelain jewellery, gloves, shoes and handbags help you complete the vision from head to toe.

In wedding dresses, Joy Cherry diverges boldly from the bridal mainstream with a simple, understated elegance devoid of unnecessary frills. "People should see you first and your gown second," says Gold. "You are the exclamation mark." Brides of today, aged 32 on average, seek a more sophisticated look than their counterparts of yesteryear, and that's just what Joy Cherry provides.

Vera Wang: less is more

Front and centre in this less-is-more movement are the internationally acclaimed designs of Vera Wang, and they're available in Canada only at Joy Cherry.

For 16 years a senior editor at Vogue Magazine, and later a design director at Ralph Lauren, Wang turned her talents to bridal wear in 1990. Her ready-to-wear collection took Barneys New York by storm in 1993, and the rest is history. She's dressed actress Sharon Stone for the Academy Awards, figure skater Nancy Kerrigan for the Olympics . . . and now you.

In Wang's words, her client wants "minimal clothes for evening, yet they must be intricately designed and still glamorous." Her fall '94 collection is distinguished by the use of lamé and the layering of fabrics to create an irridescent look as a more modern alternative to beading. Also new are the bridal accessories – armlets, the bolero, and the tulle cage, worn with or over a sheath for an innovative look of transparency and drama.

Romantic touches abound, from designs with subtle hints of lace for brides who love lace but find traditional styles too conventional – to long, voluminous veils layered over tulle trains – to the extraordinary couture details like handmade bows and bias cut ties. Even the most tailored wedding dress in the collection has a modern yet extremely feminine edge, with impeccable detailing and the unmistakable touches that have come to represent the Vera Wang sense of style.

Much more than bridal

But the bridal salon is only a part of the Joy Cherry experience. Downstairs on the main floor, you'll find all the special occasion wear one needs. Designs by Eavis & Brown, Thierry Mugler, Angel Sanchez, Louis Féraud, Peter Keppler, and Vera Wang are hand-picked by Joy with you in mind. An icon in the Canadian fashion industry, Joy can be found on the floor serving her customers, just as her mother Esther did in what is now a multi-year legacy. From general sales manager Rodger Evans on, the staff is knowledgeable, gracious, and long-lived; people who work here just never seem to leave!

Vera Wang for Joy Cherry: making every detail count

Like the salon, the main floor is abundantly skylit, offering the same delicious duality of natural and artificial light. Renovated ten years ago, the shop's the architectural equal of New York and Milan's finest.

Given the store's compelling environment and reputation, you'd think that some might be intimidated to shop here. Indeed, some are. One visit, however, should dispel any notion that it's only for the rich and famous; bridal gowns start at $1,000, designer ready-to-wear at $300. And the quality of service and expertise you'll get will make each purchase money in the bank.

Joy Cherry, Vera Wang, and plenty of sunshine. It adds up to a very uplifting bridal experience. Put on your Cloud Nine shoes and prepare for takeoff.

Ritché Wins Gold!

All the staff at Ritché's were delighted when the store was selected as The Gold Medal Winner in the Toronto Sun Peoples Choice Awards. Sun readers chose Ritché as their Number One favorite bridal store in Toronto.

Why Ritché? Ritché has been serving Canadian brides and their families for over forty years. Their staff is friendly and extremely knowledgeable and they have one of the largest selections of bridal wear available.

Wedding gowns range from simple and elegant to ornate and avant garde.

The Imported and Canadian gown collections feature designers such as Alfred Sung, Mori Lee, Paloma blanca, Alfred Angelo, Jai International, Bianci, Jessica McClintock and more. But what sets Ritché aside from all other stores is the original Ritché bridal collection and the custom design service.

Extensive selection

Mr. Ritché is still creating fabulous, custom-designed gowns exceeding brides' desires and imagination.

Mothers of the bride and groom can choose from a wide selection of suits, evening wear and beaded dresses at the Avenue Road store. The Avenue Road store also features a large selection of the latest flowergirl dresses, bridesmaids dresses, evening wear, party dresses and bridal accessories including jewelry and shoes.

Brides searching for a bargain should visit Ritché's Factory Clearance Store on Spadina Avenue (at Richmond Street west). They have a large selection of specially-priced wedding gowns at great savings. These special clearance dresses are marked down 20 percent to 70 percent off retail prices and are available in a wide range of sizes and styles.

This fall Ritché is planning a spectacular fashion show.

Couture Collection

Exciting new 1995 bridal gowns will be premiered from many bridal designers as well as the new Ritché's Couture Collection. Ritché's previous sold-out shows were fashion extravaganzas and this upcoming event will be one not to miss! Details are soon to be announced.

Come see for yourself why Ritché was awarded first prize and received their Gold Medal service.

Ritché is located at 1662 Avenue Road (south of 401) (416) 789-4378 (bridal appointments preferred) and 423 Richmond Street West (at Spadina Avenue) (416) 362-2349, no appointment necessary.

Lina's attention to detail pays off in award

How do you enjoy a quarter century of success in the bridal business and win customer satisfaction awards in the process?

Start with a fabulous showroom that offers four separate and distinct salons – one for each type of gown. Maintain an in-house alterations department with five to ten seamstresses. Employ five full-time bridal consultants. Service your customers to such an extent that no detail is too small, no request too insignificant. (You'll even add lace to a bra to increase under-the-dress comfort). Price your gowns affordably (from $700). Carry a fabulous selection of suits and party dresses, up to size 20 in stock and up to size 26 by special order. Last but not least, keep things in the family as much as possible, from founders Lina and Tony Pollari to son Sam and daughter Pat (if that's not familia, what is?)

Though the business was built on Lina's custom work (which is still available to customers who want it), clients can now choose from an impressive selection of designer gowns from Scaasi, Milady, Sposabella, Mori Lee, and others. Once your gown has arrived it can be extensively altered as needed. Gloves can be custom designed to match your dress, and a full range of other accessories (headpieces, shoes and jewellery) is also available. Crystal jewellery can be custom coloured.

A tour of the shop reveals many of the simple, modern styles currently in vogue, but the traditional look is here too if you prefer it. The Silk Room offers a range of gowns from simple to ornate (priced from $850) with matching silk flower girl dresses. A second room features off-the-shoulder and straight styles (from $700), some with short sleeves and/or tulle skirts. The Large Room has the fuller-skirted tulle and organza dresses. Finally, the Traditional Room (for the romantic in you) offers high-necked and open-necked styles.

The store is large but cozy, since each room is fully enclosed and offers total privacy.

It's this kind of service and dedication to excellence that has garnered Lina's two Retail Council of Canada Awards and the 1994 Toronto Sun Readers' Voice Award as Toronto's favourite bridal shop.

The latter award is especially significant since it's based on a Toronto-wide survey. Pat emphasizes that the Pollaris "work daily" to earn these accolades. And they look forward to doing so "for the next 25 years and beyond," says Sam.

In celebration of their Silver Anniversary, Lina's is offering clients a chance to win their dream gown and a honeymoon vacation at the Radisson Cable Beach resort in the Bahamas (details in store).

Up-to-the-minute gowns and old-fashioned family values. It adds up to a very satisfying bridal experience, and Lina's looks forward to sharing it with you.

Sam Firestone Caterers has threefold agenda: quality, quality and quality

In his thirty plus years in the catering business, Sam Firestone has presided over more bar mitzvahs and weddings than most people witness in a lifetime. As Catering Manager, son Leslie now has the opportunity to carry on a family catering tradition whose hallmark is quality. Does it ever get boring?

"Never", says Les. "Making people happy is our biggest reward. If we can put smiles on our customers' faces, we've done our job."

If catering was baseball and smiles were wins, Sam Firestone would undoubtedly be in the hall of fame today; but he and Les will settle for their reputation as a kosher caterer you can rely on for quality, service, and realistic prices. "We give extra but we don't charge extra", says Sam.

Non-members welcome

The banquet room at Shaarei Shomayim Synagogue, where Sam Firestone Caterers is located, is available to members and non-members alike. Like the people who cater it, the facilities are warm and inviting. Sam and Les pride themselves on a low-key, no-nonsense approach. They are there to put you at ease and offer their expertise to make your simcha a success.

Under strict supervision of the Kashruth Council, Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto (C.O.R.), Sam Firestone Caterers has a full-time mashgiach on the premises.

Innovative menus are another Sam Firestone forte, and Les takes great pains to ensure that along with the quality comes a fresh approach. Part of his role with the company has been to develop new simplified menus offering customers the latest food trends and a broader range of price options. Most families have moved from traditional Jewish menus to a more upscale modern kosher. Children's menus once dominated by hot dogs and fries have "graduated" to fajitas and Chinese food. "Creating original menus customized to your individual needs is what we do best", says Les.

The name of Sam Firestone Caterers has been linked with that of Congregation Shaarei Shomayim for over thirty years. It's been an integral part of synagogue life, involved in its largest ceremonial dinners, its religious celebrations and the milestone events that mark the lives of the individuals and families of the congregation. Sam Firestone, son Leslie and staff take pride in offering the same quality of service to the community at large.

"Value for your dollar" is one concept that will never go out of style, and nowhere is it implemented better than at Sam Firestone Caterers.

Joanne Katz earns kudos at Regal Kosher Caterers

Regal Kosher Caterers, a front-runner in both innovative and traditional Kosher catering, is under the exclusive direction of partners Joe Elmaleh, C.A., Rabbi A.J. Eisenberger, and Mendy Goldman. So are King Solomon's Table, a full-service Glatt Kosher restaurant, and The Wok 'N Deli Glatt Kosher restaurant.

In March 1994, catering manager Joanne Katz joined the team at Regal. Since coming aboard, she has been kept busy booking weddings, bar and bat mitzvahs and other special occasions. She was already well known in the community, having served in the Kosher catering field for 12 years; she brings to her position both experience and a conscientious attitude. Now that she has settled in at Regal, she enjoys taking pride in the results of her work.

Regal's policy is that quality is achieved through attention to detail, and to all the needs of the individual customer. This approach is paying off, with a long list of satisfied customers and a growing number of referrals.

Joanne has been given full authority in the catering department. She is a bubbly personality who exudes high energy and enthusiasm. Joanne finds it refreshing to work with Elmaleh, Eisenberger and Goldman. She says that like her customers, the partners have become friends and supporters. "A positive attitude is easy," she reflects, "when you enjoy success, and are appreciated both by principals and clients."

Now, she believes, is a good time for her to thank both the many customers and the principals who have contributed so much to the success of Regal Kosher Caterers.

Bookings brisk

The best advertising, Joanne insists, is referral from a satisfied customer – and she's pleased to report that Regal is heavily booked for the coming months. Those bookings include Joanne's son Steven (wedding, May 1995) and it's reasonable to assume that word of mouth weighed heavily in his choice of caterers.

Regal offers a varied menu, and quality of preparation is paramount. Selection is important, says Joanne, but to make it meaningful, you have to have the talent in the kitchen.

Once and for all, Regal disproves the old stereotype of Kosher food. Along with tried-and-true standards like prime rib, there are many delicious Oriental, Middle Eastern and Continental dishes. Moreover, Regal has incredibly talented chefs to fulfill all catering and restaurant cuisine requirements.

Among their creations, Penne al Salto (pasta tossed with olive oil, garlic, fresh tomato, basil and rappini) is a light, lively burst of Italian sunshine. Chicken Sorentina (scallopini of chicken breast topped with eggplant, tomato and oregano) shows an exciting new way to serve chicken. Veal Marango (stewed veal with mushrooms, demiglace, tomatoes and herbs, served with steamed rice and vegetables) will make you a veal lover if you aren't one already.

As always, Regal is committed to making quality Kosher food accessible to everyone. At King Solomon's Table, the all-you-can-eat Chinese dinner buffet is only $14.95 (on Sundays and holidays, $16.95). At lunch, a version of this buffet with fewer items, but still all you can eat, is available for $7.95.

Regal's offices and permanent Kosher kitchen, as well as King Solomon's Table, are located in the Montecassino Place Hotel at 3710 Chesswood Drive in Downsview. King Solomon's is available for business luncheons as well as private parties. The Montecassino Place Hotel offers elegant ballrooms for simchas and comfortable suites for guests, with attractive group rates and weekend and overnight packages.

Delicious dilemma

The Wok 'N Deli in Thornhill offers an innovative Chinese, Delicatessen, and full Continental menu, which enjoys ongoing popularity at lunch and dinner. Here, the world's most delicious dilemma (do you wok or do you deli?) continues to intrigue the patrons. Even during peak hours, lineups are brief, and the service is friendly and efficient. The Wok 'N Deli is located at 441 Clark Ave. West, at the corner of Hilda Ave.

The management and staff of Regal Kosher Caterers are unanimous in expressing their gratitude both to the community, for its ongoing support of all three establishments, and to Joanne Katz, for pleasing Regal's existing and growing clientele.

Joanne asserts that working with her clients is "a privilege and a pleasure", and invites you to contact her at Regal Kosher Caterers. She will take care to ensure that your function is a success. To book your special occasion, call Joanne Katz at (416) 630-0303.

"WE'LL MAKE YOUR WEDDING SO EASY, YOU'LL WONDER WHY YOU EVER WORRIED"

Relax. Just pick up the phone, call Joanne Katz at (416) 630-0303, and watch your worry-free experience unfold. Joanne will attend to every detail so that you can enjoy your party as you should.

Everything you need is conveniently under one roof: Fabulous ballrooms. Exquisite international cuisine (prepared on the premises in our permanent Kosher kitchen). Beautiful table settings. Comfortable accommodations for your out-of-town guests. A full-service Glatt Kosher restaurant (King Solomon's Table) right on the premises for your everyday dining. King Solomon's is also available for your smaller functions (up to 120 people) on Saturday night or Sunday morning/afternoon.

Give Joanne a call. She'd love to help you make your party very special. It's her privilege . . . and her pleasure.

Studio 87 specializes in capturing memories

Studio 87 is a well-established company which offers competitive prices, professional service, teamwork and personal attention. It has a solid reputation in the Italian, Portuguese and Greek communities, and has expanded in spite of the recession; but it is only beginning to tap the Jewish market. Of the 800 weddings Studio 87 has done in the last four years, about ten percent were Jewish.

Eight years ago, approximately three out of ten weddings were recorded on video. Today, it is almost ten out of ten. Studio 87 saw the trend at that time, and was one of the few companies to offer video and photography services together.

Create the perfect stage

Studio 87 is a large facility with 4,500 square feet of studio space at its new location, and offers you photography and video services all under one roof. There are custom designed sets to create the perfect stage for your wedding or other event, from traditional elegance to a creative or contemporary look.

There is a video production division for weddings, bar and bat mitzvahs, sweet sixteens and any other celebration, as well as corporate events. Studio 87 uses A-B-Roll editing and industrial format S-VHS with digital effects.

If you are planning a wedding or bar mitzvah, you will probably want all these services. At Studio 87, you can find both.

This is a studio with corporate experience and know-how, which does professional quality work; yet, because the overhead is kept down by being spread over two services, the cost is competitive. What is more, Studio 87 can get the video to you within three to four weeks after your event.

Benefits of teamwork

Here, where the team has been together since 1986, you also enjoy the benefits of teamwork. You do not have to hire your photographer and videographer separately, then hope they will work together. At Studio 87, they have worked together as a team for years, know and respect each other's needs, and will work together for you.

There are no standardized "packages". Everything is personalized, tailored to you, the individual customer.

Studio 87's new home is at 160 Applewood Cres., Units 23 and 24, in Concord near Highways 7 and 400. There is ample free parking. Come see us soon, or call: (905) 669-3672.

Miller Entertainment Music for Every Occasion

If you're planning a party or a special event, and you want to keep your guests entertained with fun, laughter and music all night long, the Shelley Miller Band is definitely the right choice.

Shelley Miller has over 25 years of experience in the music profession. The band consists of Shelley as manager, leader and bass player, and features as vocalists his talented wife Sharon Smith-Miller, Jim Gillard and Robin Langdon, along with other vocalist/musicians on drums, guitar, keyboards and saxophone.

Depending on the size of your party and your budget, you can have the size of the band customized to suit your needs.

"Whether it's a wedding, bar mitzvah, anniversary, engagement, birthday or corporate function, we know and understand just how important these special events are for both you and your guests," says Shelley.

"We're here to make sure everyone will walk away with fond memories that will last a lifetime."

The Shelley Miller Band offers you fully rehearsed professional musicians and state-of-the-art instruments, lighting and sound equipment. They also provide one of the largest rosters of songs on the market, including top 40, rock classics, Jewish folk music and love ballads.

As an experienced band leader, Shelley will customize the music according to your preference. He will also assist with co-ordinating your event, from when the speeches are made to special introductions, announcements and candle lighting.

He will also inform the camera crew when something important or special is about to happen--like the horah or the bride dancing with her father--so they can capture the moment on video.

Shelley says: "We try to encourage family and friends to sing special songs at these parties, but we do appreciate advance notice, so that we can rehearse with them prior to the event. We really enjoy making everyone's dreams come true.

"It is important that you see and hear for yourself what you are about to buy. That's why we offer our clients the opportunity to come to one of the events we are playing at, while keeping in mind that the music is customized to meet the desires and needs of each party."

If you are unable to attend one of the parties the band is playing for, Shelley has audio and video demonstration tapes available for when he meets you to discuss the planning of your party.

Miller Entertainment now offers a new feature: a capella music (vocal only, without instruments) for Sabbath celebrations.

For more information on how you can make your party the most successful event of the year, call Shelley Miller at 481-1034.

Adele Wechsler adds new twists to wedding themes

If you're looking for something distinctively different in a wedding dress, chances are you'll find it at Adele Wechsler. With a penchant for unusual fabric combinations, rich textures and striking secondary colours, Wechsler offers an eclectic variety of design choices you're unlikely to find elsewhere.

Rather than discarding her early background in knits and coordinates, Wechsler (now celebrating her 12th anniversary as a designer) built on it and incorporated many of its delightful accents into her bridal and special occasion wear. Indeed, the transition was born of a demand by clients to get married in the same type of outfits she creates for regular day and evening wear.

You can see the results in her two-piece designs for informal weddings. With an emphasis on knits and chiffons, these outfits are a perfect understatement for the second time bride or any bride who prefers a low-key approach. After the wedding, they can be worn again, along with the pleasant memories to which they give rise.

If you prefer a more traditional gown, Wechsler's designs are characterized by a clean, contemporary look with all of the glamour you want and none of the clutter you don't. Making strong use of silk crepes, crepe-backed satins and similar fabrics, Wechsler favours a streamlined look – perhaps with a bias cut – having a bit of a swing to it as opposed to a full look. White and ivory are ongoing colour favourites.

With a dizzying array of designs and designers to choose from, it's nice to know there's a refreshing alternative like Adele Wechsler to turn to.

Margo's Custom Hats make you whoever you want to be Style. Dignity. Elegance. Flair. Drama. Mystery. These are just some of the qualities the right hat can give you, and Margo's Custom Hats has built an enviable reputation for creating the looks that women are looking for.

Thirty-three years at the same location speaks volumes about the kind of quality and service offered at Margo's. Before buying the business five years ago, present owner Effie Xynnis-Hall (also known as Margo) apprenticed under former owner Lillian Fletcher because it was "the only place in Canada" where she could learn the finer points of hatmaking.

With an extensive background in fashion and costume design (some of it with the National Ballet of Canada), Effie found the world of hats provided a natural outlet for her creative talents. Those talents are now in demand by the entertainment industry; Effie is often asked to create elaborate hats for theatrical and motion picture productions. On a more down-to-earth note, she also designs headware for women suffering from cancer to help them maintain their dignity and elegance during this difficult period.

Surprisingly, Margo's custom work is often less expensive than ready-made hats sold elsewhere. For example, Margo's custom-made bridal veils (noted for their fullness) start at only $69. Her ready-to-wear prices are equally reasonable: winter hats range from $40 to $170, summer hats from $12 to $170. And the selection is endless; you'll find hats in every conceivable fabric and style. Bring in your own fabric (wool, leather, fur, almost anything except the skins of protected species, which Effie won't touch), and she'll custom-make a hat in the style of your choice. If you have a picture of a hat that captures your fancy, Effie can create your hat from the picture.

Weddings, bar mitzvahs, bat mitzvahs, and the high holidays provide much of Margo's business. Bridal headpieces are a specialty, and anything from the simple to the ornate can be designed to match your wedding dress.

Buying a hat at Margo's means receiving the kind of expert service and advice you won't get in a department store. The hat needs to compliment the shape of your face, your bone structure, and other features; if it doesn't, Effie will tell you and advise an alternative. The hat needs to fit perfectly; if it doesn't, Effie will alter it as needed. You can bring in your old hats for expert repair or retrimming, and she'll advise you whether it's worthwhile to do so.

Most of the styles Margo's sells are of the classic and enduring variety, but trend-setting styles are always available. Cloches are big for fall, as are faux furs and the 'twenties look. For any occasion, Margo's will outfit you with a hat that brings out the best in you and your dress or suit.

Hotel Inter-Continental Toronto a wonderful wedding setting

Making sure that a wedding goes well involves hundreds of details. The Hotel Inter-Continental Toronto offers to take care of them all under one roof. The less stress on the wedding party, the more enjoyment for everyone – bride, groom, family and friends. The Hotel Inter-Continental Toronto hosts wedding parties of 40 to 250 people, starting at $75 per guest, plus 15 percent gratuity and 15 percent tax. The buyer knows the spending limit; the only uncertainty is how many guests to invite, and how many will come.

The Hotel Inter-Continental Toronto offers something special to the guests as well as to the bride and groom.

After 6:00 p.m., there is complimentary parking for the whole party. At 6:00 p.m., there is a one-hour cocktail reception with complimentary piano player, open bar and hot and cold hors d'oeuvres. This is followed by an elegant four-course dinner with imported wine, and a glass of sparkling wine for toasts. There is a four-hour open bar after dinner, and coffee and tea service at midnight.

The bride and groom may enjoy three complimentary nights at an Inter-Continental hotel in New York, Washington, D.C., Miami, New Orleans, Los Angeles, San Francisco or Maui. Or, there is the alternative of one free room on the night of the wedding for every $1,000 spent (before taxes and gratuities) to a maximum of ten. For example, if there were 100 guests at $75 each, totalling $7,500, there would be seven rooms for the bride and groom to offer family and friends.

Rates start at $145 for a single or double room, with special rates during the winter months. Upon arrival on the wedding night, the bride and groom receive a complimentary suite and chilled champagne. Before setting out next morning on their honeymoon, they are served a continental breakfast (sliced fruit, Danish pastry, croissants and coffee).

If you wish, the Hotel Inter-Continental Toronto will organize every aspect of your wedding within the domain of the hotel, from flowers to entertainment. It is the catering manager's responsibility to do this, and make the festivities as simple, stress-free and enjoyable as possible for everybody.

If you just want to travel far from crowds and conventions, the Hotel Inter-Continental Toronto is for you as well. It is a "boutique hotel" for individual business travellers, families, intimates and small groups (and possibly a celebrity or two in search of privacy and quiet).

The Hotel Inter-Continental in Toronto is at 220 Bloor St. West, just west of Avenue Rd., across from the Royal Conservatory of Music. For more information, ask for the catering manager at (416) 960-5200.

Host a catered evening.

Delight in a free night.

At Hotel Inter-Continental Toronto, for every $1,000 you spend on a memorable wedding reception or catered evening event, you'll receive a complimentary overnight stay valid for one year.

Our renowned service and attention to detail mean you won't have to worry about a thing – just enjoy. Plus we feature seven luxurious reception rooms that accommodate from 20 to 250 people. And an outdoor courtyard where you can hold your party by moonlight under the stars.

Our Complimentary Overnight Stay offer is limited.

Christian Boutique

In 1974, Nello Bianco and his wife Rita founded the Christian Boutique for ladies' wear. Their present clientele extends over two, almost three generations, from young women aged 18 up through adulthood. This is a specialty shop which imports designer clothes, mainly from Italy.

Moschino of Italy is well known for its couture, and "cheap and chic" line. The Versace line features a casual, dressy look with many different styles for almost any occasion, and Alberta Ferretti, both of Italy, feature suits which go well in the office, but can also, with a change of blouse and shoes, be worn as evening or dinner dress. Mariella Burani, a diverse, well-established Italian line, offers daywear, suits, coats and evening wear. From Paris, Lolita Lempicka features an avant-garde line for younger women. As for accessories like shoes and bags--especially a good selection of well-made, comfortable, stylish shoes--there is Armando Polini of Italy.

In 1982, Nello bought and renovated the building where his store is located. Since then, Christian Boutique has occupied the entire ground floor. It is a big store with 36 feet frontage and 3,500 square feet inside, with a large selection; a good product deserves a good ambience.

Alterations are done free on the premises by expert seamstresses, on the same or the next day. Nello, who is also a designer, does custom design on the premises, and will supply everything including fabric.

For Nello, the most satisfying aspect of the business is to see people who buy a good product and good service come back for more. Good materials and work, last longer, and in the long run, they are what brings the customer back.

This has always been true; but in the past few years, the insistence on quality has increased. People want clothes which last, and which can be worn in more than one situation. With the increasing number of women in business and the professions, this trend has accelerated.

The Christian Boutique is at 1236 St. Clair West, one-and-a-half blocks west of Dufferin.

Wedding & Party Productions: An Easier Way To Do Your Wedding Shopping

Wedding & Party Productions offers its clients complete, customized wedding or party packages. As well, everyone can do a lot of their shopping right from home, and they only need to pay one company for all their expenses.

Melissa Flam, director of Wedding & Party Productions, believes that brides and grooms should not have to withstand the confusion and inconvenience of travelling to a number of different locations, where each company is separate, and carries different policies and procedures.

Hassle free planning

"A wedding is stressful enough on its own. There is no need to make things more frustrating for the bride or groom. Planning a wedding should be convenient, hassle-free, and most of all: enjoyable," notes Melissa

Some of Wedding & Party Productions services and products include: makeup artists, hair stylists, photographers, disc jockeys, men's tuxedos, custom bridal gowns and bridesmaids dresses, wedding cakes, balloons, invitations, honeymoon travel packages, and so much more.

Wedding & Party Productions can accommodate any size budget, and offers each client the freedom and flexibility to customize his/her own personal package.

Tailored to all budgets

What contributes to the company's appeal is their free wedding and party coordinating, provided with every booking. This includes, presenting their professional products and services to you at your home, selecting the necessary items to suit your budget, and coordinating all products and services in terms of color and theme.

Consultants are available at an extra charge (but are recommended), for compiling speeches, or floor plans, coordinating the wedding rehearsal, and to oversee the whole event on the big day.

After booking with Wedding & Party Productions for your special occasion, you will definitely agree that this is an easier way to do your wedding or party shopping!

Store's bridal registry offers quality, service and affordable prices

At Bronson's China & Gifts, dedication to service has been a significant factor in creating their reputation for excellence.

"This is a customer-oriented store," says owner Ilene Bronsteter, who has been serving brides for over 15 years now at the spacious location in Thornhill.

Many of her clients have heard about Bronson's through word of mouth, from the glowing recommendations of their friends and relatives.

Ilene prides herself on having one of the best bridal registries in the country and she says it caters to any budget.

The friendly staff of Bronson's helps brides pick out their patterns and assists them in co-ordinating their tabletops from the store's huge selection of high quality dinnerware, flatware, stemware and giftware.

The atmosphere in the store is relaxed and unintimidating. Specializing in catering to brides, the knowledgeable staff are there to supply helpful service.

The huge selection of quality items at Bronson's means the store has something for every bride.

Bronson's offers modern and contemporary designs, as well as traditional patterns from around the world.

The international brand names Bronson's carries include Rosenthal, Mikasa, Noritake, Wedgewood, Fitz & Floyd, Villeroy & Boch and many others. Beautiful handpainted Italian designs are available too.

And, with Bronson's competitive pricing policy, brides always get the best price.

The 7,000-sq. ft. store also offers a full range of kitchen and decorative giftware. Stock is constantly updated, so customers are sure to find the latest in home-decorating items.

Gift wrapping, same-day delivery and telephone orders are a few of Bronson's special services. As their inventory is computerized, service is quick.

Bronson's is located at 2 Steeles Ave. W. and parking is plentiful. Bronson's is open seven days a week for bridal convenience.

Best Selection Best Value...

Bridal Registry

Since 1979, thousands of brides have relied on Bronson's Bridal Registry for gifts that are cherished long after the big day. Stavros takes tuxedos and suits to new level

Stavros Theodoropoulos, the master tailor, doesn't just love his business – he's in love with it.

This is, perhaps, a fitting factor when you realize that Stavros has been outfitting bridegrooms and groom's men with custom-made, hand-tailored tuxedos and suits for the past 40 years.

Asked if he made the tuxedo for his own wedding in 1968, Stavros replies proudly, "Yes! Of course!"

For today's bridegrooms, Stavros offers the best – be it raw materials ($250 a yard for pure silk), customer service and comfort (a refreshment bar and sitting room), or the latest in styling. It all adds up to a top-of-the-line tuxedo or suit that will look great for years.

"People spend so much on pictures when they get married!" Stavros comments.

He stresses the point that many keepsake portraits have been ruined because grooms opt to buy or rent garments that don't offer the quality styling and attention to detail a Stavros creation does.

He admits that it costs money to purchase his kind of quality but he asks, "If the bride can pay up to $3,000 for a dress she will wear once, why shouldn't the groom invest in a garment that costs about the same as the dress, but is one that he will be able to wear again?"

Good question.

For added practicality, Stavros offers to convert the tuxedo into a business suit by removing the silk detailing from the lapel and pockets after the wedding.

Some of the detailed work that grooms have come to expect on Stavros' tuxedos include pure silk facing and silk covered buttons. On suits, quality is seen in the hand-stitched button holes and a flower slit that has a notch stitched inside to accommodate the flower stem.

At Stavros's Yorkville boutique, grooms can also choose between custom or ready-made shirts and a full selection of wedding attire accessories.

Stavros has one complaint about his business – it's a dying trade. Young people today don't have the patience, he laments.

As the last of Toronto's tailors from the 'old school', Stavros enjoys the reputation he has developed over the years.

Stavros's pride in his craftsmanship is evident – it can be seen in every tuxedo or suit that walks out of his boutique.

You want everything to be just right at your simcha

On the most important day in your life, you deserve the absolute best without compromise!

The finest cuisine, the best in service, the most beautiful and spacious facilities, all at reasonable prices. Beth Avraham Yoseph of Toronto together with Jacobs Catering offer you all of the above to make you simcha unforgettable.

Weddings are the primary affairs at BAYT. In fact the shul is geared towards them with its three areas for ceremonies which include the main sanctuary, the outdoor chupah garden, and the foyer (where a skylight will open to allow for a service under the stars). BAYT can accommodate from 50 to 1,000 for a sit-down in the banquet hall, and the Sisterhood hall downstairs holds up to 300 people. BAYT also offers a dairy kitchen serving up to 250 people. Three different bridal rooms are available for use.

For close to 40 years, Jacobs Catering has been known for its excellence in catering and personalized service. Owner Kalman Lowenthal and his assistant Doreen Greenspan work together to assist you at every sep, right through the day of your party until the last guest has left.

Together with the experience of their European trained chefs they offer creative and flexible menus to suit any taste. Favorite dishes on the menu are from the most traditional to the most innovative. Entrées could include such items as medallions of veal with peppercorn sauce or grilled breast of chicken forestiere. Desserts such as chocolate opera cake on vanilla coulis with fresh berries or apple tartlet with fresh fruit sorbet lend the final touch to the perfect meal.

Prices at Jacobs Catering are competitive: one of Jacob's popular "package deals" for $50. per person includes bar, hors d'oeurves, dinner and sweet table.

For more information contact Jacobs Catering, 613 Clark Avenue, Thornhill. Telephone: (905) 886-3832 or the BAYT Synagogue at (905) 886-3810.

Royal Woodbine birdies weddings, aces corporate functions

You wouldn't dare bring your golf clubs to your child's wedding. At Royal Woodbine, however, no-one could blame you for keeping them in the trunk – just in case.

With a splendid new clubhouse facility to go along with its championship golf course (home to the 1994 Infiniti Tournament Players' Championship), the pride and joy of owners Larry Ungerman and Arnold Porter has become a favourite destination for corporate luncheons and functions – and weddings. Whether or not the "I do's" have been followed immediately by "fore!" is not known; if they have, nobody's owning up.

For corporate meetings and luncheons, however, there's no need for subterfuge; if you've ever been in the boardroom and wished you were on the golf course, this is the place to have your cake and eat it too. And the well-appointed club environment "is accessible to members and non-members alike on a year-round basis", says Ungerman.

The main dining room is a visual delight. A floor-to-ceiling glass wall affords a breathtaking view of the 18th hole, putting green, lake and valley with the Mimico Creek winding through it. The decor (redwood tables and floral-upholstered chairs) is the esthetic equal of any ballroom. You can meet and dine here, or in the adjacent conference room. After you've "holed out" your meeting, you can "tee off" your golf game. After the game, you can relax in the warm green-walled lounge with plush leather chairs, oversized video screen and vintage golf photos.

But you don't need to be a golf nut to enjoy the party facilities; anyone seeking a pristine natural setting for their meeting or for fine dining will be well-served here.

Food and beverage manager Malcolm Dawson presides over the kitchen, which offers an eclectic range of affordably-priced gourmet fare. If you prefer to have your function kosher catered, Malcolm will arrange it with a caterer of your choice.

The facility can accommodate up to 150 people for weddings and other events. In summertime, for that "back-to-nature" experience, you can hold your ceremony outside by the lake, then move inside for dinner and dancing ... or linger on the spacious outdoor patio. The course is literally seconds away from the airport, and attractive hotel packages can be arranged with the neighbouring Radisson Suites and Carlton Place hotels.

It's a lovely place and well worth a visit. The dining lounge is open year-round, so you can drop by and sample the cuisine with some fabulous gourmet lunches starting at only $5.95.

Royal Woodbine's new clubhouse, now open

"Special Treatment on a Special Day"

The Delta London Armouries in London, Ontario has the rare combination of an exquisite site, 250 well-appointed, elegant guest rooms and a Kosher Meat Kitchen catering to private banquets, under supervision of the Vaad haKashrut.

At the Delta, they pride themselves on making everyone's most important day just right. Their experienced catering team will look after your every whim and requirement. No detail is too small... even to the extent of matching your table linens to the colour theme of your wedding! In addition to consulting with clients about florists and photographers, the Delta staff will help arrange for the chupah and entertainment. Another special service that is unusual, is the ability for the bride and groom to try their menu items beforehand at a complimentary tasting. The talented kitchen staff have prepared such specialties as "Lemon Breast of Chicken Veloute with Baby Corn and Mushroom Potatoes" followed by "Carmelized Poached Pear on Raspberry Coulis with a dusting of Cocoa Powder"!

The Delta's two beautifully appointed ballrooms have unique details like antique chandeliers, a marble fireplace and cherry wood trim and can accommodate from 50 to 200 people. Guests that have held Kosher functions at the Delta Armouries include the London Jewish Federation Board Dinner, Haddasah-Wizo Youth Aliyah Reception and the Jewish Student Union of Western Ontario Graduation.

The Delta London Armouries offers complimentary accommodation for the bride and groom with any wedding which hosts 50 or more guests, and special rates are available for overnight accommodation for guests and the bridal party. There is also a special "honeymoon suite" which has its own baby grand piano, complete living room and sumptuous bathroom. With a restaurant on the premises, out-of-town wedding guests can enjoy breakfast, lunch, dinner and Sunday Brunch during their stay.

What is most unique about the Delta is the special building; the modern, glass tower which contains the guest rooms rises out of the heritage property of the Armouries; a castle-like building built at the turn of the century. A popular spot for wedding pictures is the stairway in the main area which leads up to an open atrium, surrounded by lush, live gardens. "Even the largest wedding party can be photographed here easily because of the graceful twist and slope of the stairs", says Catering Manager, Eva Mork. "Photos never fail to turn out here - we've had people call because they have seen friend's wedding pictures and want to have their reception in the same spot," says Eva. Adding to the charm of this particular area is the sound of gently falling water - a sculptural water fountain sits below the atrium.

In short, the Delta is a spectacular place for a "perfect wedding".

The Perfect Wedding... in the Perfect Setting.

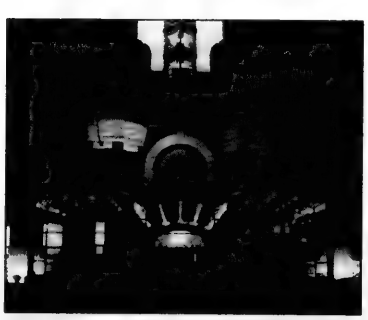
The Delta London Armouries offers the rare combination of elegant surroundings, 250 guest rooms and a kosher kitchen for catering – perfect for your wedding! Service is available for banquets up to 200 people – Kashruth, under the supervision of Vaad haKashrut of London. Also:

- Complimentary accommodation for the bride & groom when hosting 50 or more guests
- Complimentary menu tasting for bride & groom to ensure menu is most appropriate



- Experienced catering managers to look after all your hotel requirements
- Special bridal party rates for overnight accommodations
- Your choice of linen colours
- Free use of garden encased stairway for pictures

The Park Plaza Hotel and The Bristol Place Hotel offer Perfect Settings for your Special Occasion

The Park Plaza Hotel

A perfect midtown location and a truly romantic setting, the Park Plaza Hotel has for over 60 years catered engagement and rehearsal parties, weddings, anniversaries, and social occasions of all kinds.

The permanent kosher kitchen was opened in 1987 and over the past seven years the Park Plaza Hotel has been offering excellent kosher cuisine, specializing in catering events for 30 to 300 guests.

A successful and memorable wedding can begin in the Park Plaza Hotel with ceremony and the reception to follow taking place in either of the two main ballrooms (the Empress or Plaza Rooms) or in The Roof Salon, one of the most romantic settings in Toronto with an unparalleled view of the city.

The catering team, headed by Naomi Chan (Catering Manager) and Lianne Adelson (Catering Coordinator), will help you plan your special event down to the last detail. Chefs Dominique Dien (Executive Chef of the Bristol Group), and Joan Lamontagne (Executive Sous Chef of the Park Plaza Hotel) open a floodgate of culinary possibilities and will help you plan a full course menu to eliminate guesswork.

The Park Plaza Hotel offers a number of all-inclusive wedding packages.

The Bristol Place Hotel

The Bristol Place Hotel has catered weddings and special social events for over 20 years and offers the selection of four fabulous ballrooms in a variety of sizes and decor.

The Bristol Place Hotel has always maintained the reputation of the "airport area's five star hotel". Executive Chef Dominique Dien and Executive Sous Chef Noel Fernandes have designed menus for all occasions. The catering team is headed by Director of Catering Kurt Mader and Assistant Catering Manager Lisa Tracz, who are both anxious to assist you in planning all the details of your important function.

The Bridal Shows

Both the Park Plaza Hotel and the Bristol Place Hotel share the same high standards in the handling of social functions and elegant catered events.

To showcase their bridal amenities, The Bristol Group will stage two Sunday Bridal Shows in October.

The Bridal Shows will be held at the Park Plaza Hotel on Sunday, October 16 and at the Bristol Place on Sunday, October 23.

The Bridal Shows will be set up in an "Open House" format which will offer the "Bride-to-be" the perfect opportunity to be presented with all the essential services she needs for her wedding.

Complimentary afternoon high tea will be served at the Park Plaza Hotel as you visit the show and at the Bristol Place Hotel, refreshments will be provided. Services will include: florists, wedding consultants, hairstylists, bridal wear, limousine rental, make-up artists, china, photographers, and much more.

For more information, call us directly at the Park Plaza (416) 924-5471 and the Bristol Place Hotel (416) 675-9444 – we look forward to seeing you at our shows.

Video company utilizes new Advanced Technology

Richard Saunders has formed a video production company dedicated to the excellence of special event videography. Redstone specializes in weddings, bar/bat mitzvahs and family parties

In 1989 Saunders started out as videographer for Hudson Taylor Studios. He was also responsible for overseeing all video production.

In April 1993, Saunders took over the assets of Hudson Taylor Video, including all the production facilities. From that point on, he began producing videos independently.

Completely customized

Videos from Redstone Pictures are completely customized according to the clients' preferences. Clients can choose to begin their wedding video with baby pictures of the bride and groom, or include any other material they would like to see.

Redstone's graphics department also customizes backgrounds and graphics. Logos or graphics from invitations, for example, can be used in the background of the video.

Redstone believes high quality sound is of the utmost importance. They offer wireless microphones and while taping they run two audio channels to guarantee perfect sound.

Redstone also uses state-of-the-art equipment. He is one of the few videographers who has purchased "non-linear" editing equipment. This equipment of advanced technology allows for editing in hardrive vis a vis videotape, therefore the quality of both sound and image is superior. Non-linear editing equipment is digital and allows for the best end result, as there is no loss of quality work when passing from generation to generation.

After Redstone shoots your simcha, you will see the unedited tape. "We like to review the tape with the client," says Saunders. "We want the clients involved as much as possible in the production because we believe that is the only way it will reflect their taste."

It is just that kind of attention to the clients' needs that makes Redstone Pictures unique. To discuss the making a video of the next special event in your life, call (416) 256-4666.

Baycrest Hospitality Renovates

Baycrest Hospitality Services has an elegant new look. The facilities of the kosher service, which accommodates and caters groups from ten to 500, have been fully redecorated. "We've renovated all our rooms so that we can offer the perfect setting for any event," says manager Sharon Bizouati, "from personal celebrations like bar mitzvahs and weddings to professional conferences and seminars." Bizouati and her staff, who have more than 20 years' experience serving the Jewish community, are pleased with the added amenities the renovations help them to provide.

Launched in April 1993, Baycrest Hospitality offers quality catering in varied surroundings and atmosphere, from the cozy Fireside Lounge with its walkout patio onto landscaped grounds with full-grown trees, to the sophisticated ambience of the main dining room.

"In our main hall," says Bizouati, "we've created the warm, intimate look of a dining room in an elegant home, with soft pastels, chandeliers and tasteful art. A new, sophisticated system provides a full range of lighting, from bright illumination to soft candlelight, and can focus on a specific area such as a head table. Our new sound system, along with acoustic coverings for walls and hard floors, provides improved audio capabilities."

All rooms are air-conditioned and equipped for audio-visual services. Besides families celebrating special events, Baycrest Hospitality is attracting a growing clientele of community and professional associations, who will find that the lobby areas offer ample space for exhibits and demonstrations.

Baycrest Hospitality planners know that to make your event a success, they must devote their personal attention to the fine points. They will help you with all the details, like choosing musicians, florists and stationers. They will arrange limousine and audio-visual services, and advise you on selecting special consultants if you need them. For your next special occasion, call 785-2500, extension 2477. All proceeds from Baycrest Hospitality Services support Baycrest Centre.

Hudson's Bay Catering offers splendid setting for simchas

The main dining hall in the old Bay building: 48-foot ceilings, massive skylights, Roman columns . . . and superb seven-course meals from $38.

The name "Hudson's Bay Company" evokes romantic images of a bygone era and a company that satisfied its clients' demands through thick and thin. (Often in subzero temperatures!)

Gone are the fur traders, but the romantic appeal and the desire to please live on in Hudson's Bay Catering. For 44 years, this division of The Bay has quietly prepared fabulous receptions for weddings, bar and bat mitzvahs in one of the most breathtaking settings anywhere.

Spectacular setting

The main dining hall is, quite simply, remarkable. Sculptured 48-foot ceilings tower over the beige-and-earth-toned tile floor. Three massive skylights (each 20' x 20') leave the entire room bathed in natural light. (Which is good news for the dozen or so natural palm trees dotting the dining room floor!) Four majestic chandeliers supply ample lighting when the sun sets.

The room is skirted by massive Roman columns and banked with exquisite semicircular enclaves which, together with the central seating arrangements, allow the room to seat 350 comfortably (or 1,000 standup). Yet a party of 20 can dine intimately (you have to see it!).

The main dining area is overlooked by a balcony-style reception area some 25 feet above, where guests can lounge comfortably prior to the main event.

Built in 1929 and renovated in 1987, the dining hall spans two floors of the old Bay building on Queen street.

A spectacular setting demands equally spectacular cuisine, and HBC delivers with exquisite and eclectic menus prepared by highly skilled chefs from all culinary backgrounds. Delightful surprises abound. For example, a standard seven-course meal offers cream of watercress with pecans, bibb and endive salad with balsamic vinaigrette, rosettes of veal in a light peppercorn sauce, parisienne potatoes, asparagus tips & roast red pepper strips, chocolate tiramisu, tea and coffee for only $38. Another selection consists of mushroom & vermouth soup, spinach salad with pine nuts, rock cornish game hen, wild rice, medley of fresh vegetables, raspberry sherbert, tea and coffee for only $30.95.

Custom menu requests are always welcome and will be expertly accommodated.

From traditional dishes through fabulous fresh desserts and pastries prepared on the premises, you and your guests will enjoy the fruits of the chefs' expertise. Even the hors d'oeuvres–an afterthought at many functions–are special enough to have generated a demand in their own right.

Competitive prices

With the magnificent setting and fine cuisine, you might expect to pay more. But prices are "competitive – and of course there's the "comfort zone" of dealing with The Bay," says Catering Manager Robert Dearing.

If the fur trappers and tradespeople of yesteryear could attend a modern-day HBC function, they'd undoubtedly be dazzled. But not surprised – after all, they'd say, "it is the Hudson's Bay Company."

TREASURY FURTHER INCREASES INTEREST RATES

ISRAEL BONDS VIEWED AS COST EFFECTIVE MEANS OF CAPITAL MOBILIZATION FOR ISRAEL'S ECONOMIC DEVELOPMENT

The Treasury of the State of Israel recently increased its Israel Bonds rates substantially in anticipation of major industrial refitting projects and immigrant absorption.

ISRAEL BONDS RECEIVE RRSP APPROVAL

Alex E. Grossman, Chairman of the Board of Canada-Israel Securities Ltd., cited RRSP-approved status as "A major development that underscores the dependability and versatility of Israel Bonds as attractive investments in the Canadian securities marketplace."

$60 BILLION NEEDED FOR INFRASTRUCTURE AND HIGH-TECH UPGRADE

Israel Bonds are expected to contribute nearly $10 billion over the next decade towards massive infrastructure and high-technology development projects. Israel has been cited by leading analysts as a potential "World Leader" in high-tech, science-based and communications-oriented export industries.

"Throughout the years, Israel Bonds has been one of the most important organizations helping to finance the development of Israel. The Government of Israel is very much in favour of Bonds and would like the Bonds Organization to continue and increase its efforts throughout the world."

ISRAEL BONDS – AN EVALUATION

Paul Bates
President,
Greenline Investor
Services Inc.

Recent interest rate increases on a number of Israel Bonds have underscored the ongoing relevance of Bonds capital to the industrial development of the State of Israel.

The State of Israel, over the next decade, will need $60 billion to refit its industrial infrastructure – a program that will be financed, in part, by the mobilization of Israel Bonds investment dollars. Indeed, Bonds capital will ultimately account for some $10 billion of the total cost of the massive ten-year undertaking.

Israel's ambitious plan is right in step with similar programs around the world. Infrastructure revamping has now become the single leading concern for developed economies in their quest to remain competitive in the 21st century global market.

The figures are dramatic and revealing: According to the Far Eastern Economic Review, seven Asian countries plan to spend $70 billion on infrastructure in 1995. France has allocated over $20 billion for construction and modernization in three major cities alone. In the U.S., one single program currently allocates over $5 billion per year to repair the nation's bridges.

As a service to prospective investors, we have outlined some of the key features of the following Israel Bonds:

INSTRUMENT	BENEFITS
Economic Development Issue (U.S. Funds)	• Extremely competitive rate of return • Early liquidity • Semi-annual interest payments • RRSP eligible (self-directed RRSP)
Zero Coupon (U.S. Funds)	• Low purchase price • Very attractive yield • Ideal for seed money; future education funds, etc. • RRSP eligible (self-directed RRSP)
Canadian Floating Rate Issue (Canadian Funds)	• Not susceptible to foreign currency fluctuation • Early liquidity • Ideal for mid-range investors • RRSP eligible (self-directed RRSP)

Moreover, some Israel Bonds, notably the Economic Development Issue, are extendible. That is to say, the investor has the option, after a fixed period of time, of either redeeming the instrument or extending until maturity. Israel Bonds are viewed by many as highly desirable additions to any well-rounded financial portfolio and have broadened their investment appeal significantly in recent years.

JCC demonstrators picket Super Sunday

Fired staff launch second protest

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Dozens of former employees of the Leah Posluns Theatre and the Jewish Community Centre (JCC), together with friends and supporters, held a rally on Super Sunday at which they charged the Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto with abandoning vital community institutions.

As United Jewish Appeal canvassers and JCC members passed by, demonstrators blamed the Federation for the demise of the Leah Posluns Theatre (LPT) and the Institute for Jewish Learning, which were closed two weeks ago.

In addition to carrying placards and circulating a petition, the demonstrators handed out a 12-page booklet prepared by "staff and lay people closely aligned for decades with the JCC." The material takes issue with claims by Federation spokesmen that the LPT was a money loser and it addresses several issues relating to the JCC's finances.

Federation spokesmen contacted by The CJN contested the allegations contained in the booklet.

The demonstrators charged the Federation with orchestrating the dismissal of 31 JCC employees by the Centre's former three-person board, which resigned on Aug. 31.

"I think when the Federation took it out on 30 [other] staff the way they did, they crossed over the line," said Paul Brownstein, the JCC's former executive director.

"These are the same people who were washing cars, doing bake sales, doing casinos until four in the morning so the JCC could raise $100,000 profit [on the casinos]," he said. "For them to suffer the consequences..."

"I think people are angry and this is the only way to show the community that what has been done is unfair," said Wilfred Posluns, the major benefactor of the Leah Posluns Theatre, which is named for his mother.

JCC president David Perlmutter said he did not agree with the way the employees were terminated. "I think it was unfair to them. There's an obligation by the community to do right by them," he said.

But Federation president Bernie Ghert said tough decisions had to be taken. He said the theatre staff was let go to save money and the JCC's central administration staff was released as part of the restructuring agreed to by the JCC and the Federation, in which the JCC's three branches will become independent entities, making central administration employees redundant.

"You have to make choices, what jobs you're going to save and which jobs you're going to lose," Ghert said. He said the departure of the 31 employees was necessary to save the job of the other JCC employees.

In an interview with The CJN, Brownstein suggested that the timing of the dismissal of the JCC and LPT staff was chosen to minimize the severance packages that would be payable to them.

Brownstein and Ghert, in a separate interview, agreed the packages for all employees would exceed $300,000 if paid in full.

But in a document sent to JCC creditors by Richter & Partners, the JCC's interim receiver, former JCC and LPT employees are designated as preferred creditors entitled to a maximum of $2,000 each. The former employees are considered unsecured creditors for the remainder owing them.

They will have to share on a "cents-to-the-dollar owed" basis with the JCC's 279 other unsecured creditors in whatever money is available after the secured and preferred creditors have been paid.

Had the employees been let go after the JCC filed a notice to creditors, whoever took over the Centre would have been responsible for the full severance packages, Brownstein said. In his case, with 28 years service, he would have been entitled by law to six months of wages. He's also owed six weeks of vacation pay.

Brownstein said the former employees have retained legal counsel to determine their rights.

According to a document obtained by The CJN from Perlmutter, there was an understanding that the Federation's moral responsibility included paying appropriate severance packages to those who were let go.

Federation spokesman Morris Zbar said that the final severance packages have not yet been determined and won't be until the JCC files its plan to creditors, sometime within the next two weeks.

Other points of dispute centre on the LPT's financial viability. "Since its inception, with the interest on the [LPT] endowment, annual fundraising, government grants, box office and rental income, the LPT has always covered its operating costs," the booklet states. "Additionally the theatre was granted $100,000 annually from the Federation, which was given back to the JCC to contribute to the central administration of the JCC and the maintenance and utility costs of the Theatre."

Syria seen as the key to peaceful relations

Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM — The United States has received "signals" from 18 Arab states that they would sign peace agreements with Israel once it and Syria have struck a peace accord, sources close to the Clinton administration have told The Jerusalem Post.

Furthermore, Syria has informed the U.S. that it will establish diplomatic relations with Israel, but only upon the conclusion of full withdrawal from the Golan Heights, the sources said. Syria has promised the U.S. that other Arab countries would join in establishing ties with Israel after full withdrawal.

Meanwhile, U.S. Secretary of State Warren Christopher has canceled plans to visit the region this week due to heightened expectations of an invasion of Haiti. Instead, senior aides to Christopher are likely to visit next week to prepare for his visit, expected after Sukkot.

Peace with Syria means Israel will have peace agreements with the entire Arab world except Iraq, Libya, and Sudan, the sources said.

"Through our own contacts with Arab countries, we have reached the conclusion that a Syria-Israel peace will mean Israel will reach peace agreements with 18 Arab states," one source said.

But he would not say if all 18 would be full-fledged bilateral peace treaties.

"However, Israelis would able to travel to Saudi Arabia, for example," he said. "Peace with Syria would trigger a transformative event with 18 Arab countries."

The source insisted that without Damascus, which retains the mantle of Arab nationalism, peace with the other countries is impossible.

Damascus "knows the price of peace," he said.

"The Syrians have said they would agree to diplomatic relations with Israel once there is full withdrawal. They keep saying that, unlike Egypt, which did not bring other Arab states with it once it signed its own deal with Israel, they would bring other Arab states along with them."

Syria has also told Washington it would establish trade relations with Israel once peace is concluded, sources said.

The U.S. sources appeared amused at last week's press reports suggesting that Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin added significant new provisos to negotiations with Syria.

Torontonian returns to shtetls of Belarus

By BEN ROSE
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — For Dr. Lawrence Gaum of Toronto a trip to Belarus (Beylorussia) to see the shtetls where his grandparents were born turned out to be an odyssey of adventure so remarkable he can't even speak of it now, months later, without deep emotion.

The well-known oral surgeon, a member of the Jewish Geneological Society, had been thinking of discovering his roots for years and he jumped at the invitation in July to join a group from Israel heading to the shtetls of Kozhanhorodok, Krasna Volya, Lachva, Luninets and other towns.

This group of 30 Israelis were Jews from the area who escaped and fought with the partisans against the Nazis.

Luckily he had already done some research, for instance scanning the lists of steamship passengers arriving in Canada in 1910 and discovering that his grandfather, Shiaya (Sam) Latucha, because of his lack of English, had led the immigration officer to put his name down as Gaum (sic) because he had a brother-in-law named Gam in Cape Breton, Nova Scotia, where he was heading.

So Gaum, 56, a nephew of Senator Jack Marshall, his wife, Hope, another uncle, Elliott Marshall, president of the Glace Bay, Nova Scotia, synagogue, and his wife, Helen, took a flight to Minsk in Belarus, little knowing what lay beyond.

Before the trip was over, he visited the shtetls where his grandfather and his grandmother, Riva Morafchick, were born, and discovered long-lost relatives.

But even more affecting were stories the group heard from eye witnesses of how Jews in those villages in 1942 were forced to strip and dig their own graves before being shot, the infants and very young children being bayoneted to save bullets.

A woman came forward in Luninets with a five-foot water color painting depicting those horrible events done by an eye witness, the delicate tints of the children in marked contrast to the colors of the storm troopers carrying out the executions. It was purchased by Esser Kriglin of New York, a former Israeli, who was one of the villagers who escaped to fight with the partisans against the Nazis.

Kriglin spent $30,000 and made four trips to Belarus to build a memorial to the 5,000 Jews who died at Luninets.

One of the Israelis, Kopel Kolponitzky, 75, a tour leader, took them to the spot where his younger brother and fiancee were shot by the Germans.

"He told us that a doctor in Krasna Volya had come out to the road to help his brother but a Nazi told him 'your job is to treat German soldiers, don't touch that Jew.' But the doctor replied, 'I will not treat any German soldier.' and the Nazi immediately shot the doctor, the brother and his fiancee," said Gaum.

Later, when they were talking together, the stocky, vigorous Kolponitzky asked Gaum what he did. "I'm an oral surgeon," was the reply. "Well, I'm a killer," Kolponitzky said matter-of-factly, explaining that his experiences as a partisan in Belarus and in Israel's War of Independence had hardened him.

'One tough little Jew'

Kolponitzky recalled that before the partisans allowed him to join them they put portions of food in front of him to see if he had enough control left to resist eating anything before he was invited to do so. "You're one tough little Jew," they told him.

His research paid off for Guam when he used an old photo of the shtetl of Kozhanhorodok showing an Orthodox Russian church with its cupola to calculate about where the home of his paternal grandparents was located. The Nazis had spared the church. But in the area not too far from the church, where all the Jews lived in a square, there was nothing, just empty land. "I looked for the five synagogues that were in the shtetl but they were gone, including the famous Kelt Synagogue."

Kozhanhorodok had a population of 3,000 to 4,000 before World War II, about half of them Jews. Today there is not a single Jew left, Gaum said. There is an obelisk memorial a little way from the village near the pit where the Jewish martyrs were buried.

The Canadians had a chance to talk to elderly residents who remember Jews who lived in the shtetl. One elderly man of 84, with tears in his eyes, told them the story of how Guam's cousin, Jack Moraff, who eventually went to Cape Breton, returned to the village to find his wife and son had been murdered by the Nazis. He went off to join the partisans.

"The way some of the women were dressed, it was as if time had stood still," said Gaum." One of the women had shoes made of bark. I don't like to say this but I think the Communists will come back. The people have nothing to eat. Under the private enterprise system they have there now, there is very little on the shelves. Under communism they had medical and dental care."

The Guams and Marshalls stood on the trackside in Luninets where their forebearers boarded a two-week train ride on their way to America.

It was from Luninets that Frutka Guam and two sons, Menasha and Boruch, departed, Menasha being Guam's late father.

"There is a little known story about my cousin, Jack Moraff, who lived in Sydney, Nova Scotia, and died three years ago. Whenever a well-known Canadian TV entertainer came on the screen, he would rush to turn it off. He said the entertainer looked exactly like the Russian who came to his inn in Kozhanhorodok two days before the Nazis arrived and said 'I want those leather boots you are wearing. If you don't give them to me now, I'll get them anyway in a couple of days." And he did.

Gaum discovers two cousins

Among other Canadians on the tour were Daniel Zalmanovitz and his uncle, Feivel Zalmanovitz, both of Edmonton, and Caryl Chernin, a Toronto filmmaker.

To his surprise, Gaum discovered two cousins on the tour, Luba Falkovich, now living in Israel, and Shlomo El'Piner, also in Israel. The Canadians went to visit another cousin, Roman Latucha, in Luninets. "I'm sure Roman used up three months of his food in giving us a party," Gaum said.

Other surviving relatives of the Gaum and Marshall families are Mrs. Sarah Gaum of Thornhill (Dr. Gaum's mother), an uncle, Max Marshall, of Montreal, and two aunts, Ettie Zweigman, Toronto, and Reta Kolonel, Ottawa.

When he catches his breath, Gaum hopes to finish a book on the geneology of his family, entitled, From Belarus to Cape Breton and Beyond.

Though there were many sad moments on the tour, the Gaums and Marshalls recall with pride the ceremony in which awards were handed to the tour members who fought with the partisans by Peter Aridevitch Skorobogasko, a deputy of the Belarus parliament, and with joy the many toasts drunk in vodka to good relations between Canadians and the Belarus people.

Montreal Film Festival lists 'Palestine' among participants

By DAVID LAZARUS
CJN Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Officials from Montreal's Israeli consulate were waiting — with increasing impatience — for their calls to be returned last week, in order to find out why the recent Montreal World Film Festival allowed "Palestine" to be listed among the participating countries.

The consulate first tried to reach the film festival's director general, Serge Losique, on August 26 by telephone, the day after the consulate got its copy of the festival's catalogue and saw "Palestine" listed in the index (Israel itself showcased five films at this year's festival).

But Israeli consul Aviva Raz said late last week — several days after the festival had concluded — that Losique had still not returned any of the consulate's calls.

"If we don't hear from them, we will have to write a formal letter," Raz said. "He has gotten our messages."

Raz said the consulate had been hoping for the festival to issue a press release during the festival explaining or apologizing for the inclusion of "Palestine."

But Raz speculated that Losique may have decided to wait until the festival was completely over to deal with the issue in order to avoid any controversy during the event.

Still, Raz did not disguise the fact that the consulate was irked by Losique's stalling.

'It is not professional'

"It is not professional," she said. "We simply want to have a clarification over this mistake."

The film screened under the heading of "Palestine" was a joint Palestinian-Dutch production called Curfew, directed by Rashid Masharawi and screened under the category Cinema of Today: Reflections of our Times.

The production company describes the 75-minute film as "the story of a Palestinian family living in a refugee camp in the Gaza Strip in the year 1993, just before the peace negotiations started."

Curfew has won three awards, including best first feature film at the Festival Video et Fraternite in Paris, best film at the Cairo International Film Festival, and the UNESCO Prize at the Cannes Film Festival.

According to Suzanne Villeneuve, who heads the public relations firm that was in charge of promoting the festival, information for the catalogue was taken from "technical sheets" submitted by production companies participating in the festival.

Festival vice-president Daniel Cauchard told Villeneuve that at Cannes, Curfew's production company also registered the film as coming from "Palestine," with no apparent fallout, Villeneuve said.

Raz suggested that while the inclusion of "Palestine" may have indeed simply been the result of festival oversight or ignorance and did not constitute a major controversy, it was also an issue the consulate was not prepared to drop until it received a satisfactory explanation from Losique.

Gaza may very well be an autonomous Palestinian region, but "autonomy is not equal to independence," Raz said.

Catholic schools lukewarm to increased Jewish funding

By JANICE ARNOLD
CJN Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — The Jewish schools' hope of full funding from the Quebec government is beginning to look premature. The director-general of the Montreal Catholic School Commission (MCSC) has shown a distinct lack of interest in the idea of forming an association with the Jewish schools, and Parti Quebecois leader Jacques Parizeau said he sees no reason to change the status quo.

In addition, the president of the provincial teachers' union, Centrale de l'Enseignement du Quebec (CEQ), denounced any increased funding to private schools, and the French-language press has published editorials criticizing the idea because it runs counter to Quebec's scheduled move toward a neutral, non-denominational school system and may open the door to the creation of more "ethnic" schools.

Education Minister Jacques Chagnon announced on August 30 that he was authorizing the 16 Jewish schools to enter into an "associate status" with the MCSC. He added that by 1997-98, government funding would reach 100 per cent (of the secular portion of the curriculum), under a phasing-in schedule to begin in 1995-96. The setting out of a timetable gave the impression the Association of Jewish Day Schools (AJDS) and the MCSC were close to, if they had not already arrived at, an agreement.

The rush to make the announcement appeared to be aimed at shoring up the campaign of Liberal D'Arcy McGee candidate Lawrence Bergman.

But it's the AJDS that has been left to explain the situation, and its phones have been ringing constantly as parents of the almost 7,000 students in the Jewish schools want to know what it means for them, especially in terms of fees.

Yves Archambault, the MCSC's director-general, said later that the board is far from such a deal and, in fact, had only met AJDS representatives once — in December 1992 — to listen to their proposal.

Archambault told La Presse: "This is a concept of an ethno-religious school which raises many questions," especially in light of the province's move toward language-based school boards.

He stressed that the Education Act stipulates that the granting of associate status is at the request of a public school board and with the permission of the education minister.

Archambault did say he would be interested in "integrating" Jewish immigrant children who don't speak English or French, such as the Russians, into the MCSC schools. This, of course, is not what the AJDS is looking for.

'Opening up a Pandora's box'

One private school, the Greek community's Ecole Socrate, has had associate status with the MCSC for about 20 years. Graduates of this elementary school are then directed into the MCSC's French high schools as part of the agreement.

The matter is not likely to be considered by the MCSC until after the school board elections in November, Archambault indicated.

It will be up to the commissioners to approve in principle any proposal to negotiate with the AJDS, he said

Parizeau accused Chagnon of "opening up a Pandora's box" and trying to gain political mileage, without considering the full implications of his promises.

AJDS executive director Joe Rabinovitch last week was waiting for the results of Monday's election before saying much about the awkward situation in which the organization finds itself

He differs with Archambault's casual depiction of talks between the MCSC and AJDS to date. "We would not have put in all the work we have over the past two years with four different education ministers if we did not have an explicit understanding that they [the MCSC] were interested as well."

As for CEQ president Lorraine Page's criticism of the idea, Rabinovitch said "that's consistent with what the CEQ has said in the past. They don't believe in grants for private schools."

Page deplored increasing grants to Jewish schools to $30 million a year when public schools are being closed because of lack of funds.

Rabinovitch said the letter the AJDS received from Chagnon has "the weight of a contract" and effectively "the force of law," and therefore cannot be broken easily by any government.

Meanwhile, the AJDS seems to have left its options open as to which school board it is willing to associate with. A letter to parents from AJDS president Barry Rishikof says the government approved the request of the AJDS for associate status with "a public school board.

"The Public Education Act (Law 107) permits a private school (Jewish day schools are defined as private schools) to enter into an agreement with a public school board in order to receive benefits granted to public schools in (that) act. The minister of education must give prior approval and determine the conditions of the agreement...

"The (AJDS) will keep your school informed as it undertakes the process to contact a public school board and reach an appropriate agreement."

Rishikof said the AJDS will only enter into an agreement with a public board that will "guarantee the autonomy, orientation, existing practices, agreements, working conditions of staff, etc., that characterize our schools."

Israeli MKs making attempt to put social issues on agenda

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Like a supertanker that's been plying the same course for miles, it takes time and a lot of effort to change Israeli domestic social policy.

But it can be done, Knesset member Raffi Elloul believes. Elloul is part of a new breed of dynamic young parliamentarians who are trying to change the priority the Israeli government gives to social issues like poverty and education.

For years, Israeli officials have been primarily concerned with issues of survival like the peace process, military funding and supporting the medical system, he said.

"I say, I want to deal with poverty first."

Elloul, a Labor Member of the Knesset (MK) who was first elected two years ago, believes that poverty and peace are inextricably intertwined. For people to see peace as an attractive option, "they must believe their standard of living is rising," he said. "People have to see tangible benefits."

A few weeks ago, Elloul and about 1,000 supporters across the country formed a grassroots movement to fight povery in Israel. "We have 700,000 under the poverty line out of 5.6 million people," he said.

The organization is called HALEV, which means the heart. It is also the Hebrew acronym for the group's name, which translates as the Movement for War Against Poverty.

Halev asks businesspeople who are members of the group to offer one student a scholarship or provide one elderly person with an income supplement.

Elloul believes that, while this micro approach does not address society's larger problems, for those who benefit, it is a major change in their lives.

"It may be a small problem, but if you have the problem, it's your whole life," he said.

Elloul's personal history gives some hint of why he focuses on social issues. A native of Morocco, Elloul and his family made aliyah when he was only three. They settled in Mazkeret Batia, one of the oldest settlements in the country, founded by Baron Edmond de Rothschild in 1882 near modern-day Rehovot.

Raffi Elloul

Elloul was five when his father died, and his mother Rina raised the family of nine children on her own.

Because of the family's dire straits, Elloul was forced to enter the workforce at the tender age of seven. As a child Elloul literally dug ditches, or at least trenches, for irrigation pipes. He also worked as a gardener.

His backbreaking schedule continued through his teenage years. Up at 6 a.m., Elloul would start the day in synagogue. By 7 he was in school where he did homework until 8. The school day ran from 8 to 3 p.m. At 4 p.m. he served as secretary of the local religious council — at 13, he was the youngest person in Israel to hold such a post.

From 7 to 10 p.m. Elloul worked as a youth instructor with the Hanoar Oved Labor youth movement. From 10 p.m. to 4 a.m., four days a week, he earned extra cash in a bakery, making do with three hours of sleep.

"Now it's easier for me to work because I don't have to sleep a lot," he said.

Elloul's stint in Mazkeret Batia's religious council prepared him for the political career ahead. He was a Laborite from his early years; ironically his career was given a boost by the 1977 election of the Likud party.

Elloul explains. In the old days of Labor politics, the parliamentary electoral list was compiled by an old boys' network of about five or six senior politicos.

But when Likud was elected with a large Sephardi vote, it jarred Labor into changing its practices, he said.

Labor adopted a primary system which produced a more democratic system of nominating potential MKs, he said. That helped him because he had always relied on campaigning for support.

In the meantime, Elloul was elected mayor of Mazkeret Batia at age 25, the youngest mayor in Israel. At 34, he was elected to the Knesset, number 13 on Labor's electoral list.

Now at the ripe old age of 36, Elloul says "I feel comfortable in my party."

Unlike the older generation of Moroccan immigrants, he did not feel discrimination, he said.

Elloul believes his experience as mayor will serve him well on the national scene. "I saw how we can solve problems."

The involvement of Canadian Jewry through Project Renewal was a real eye-opener for him and for other Israelis. Many people thought the town's seemingly intractable social problems could not be solved, but the Canadians showed otherwise, Elloul said.

Funds provided through the United Israel Appeal (UIA) helped build a community centre, two special clubs for seniors and two clubs for the physically and mentally disabled. There are two small after school clubs for children as well.

The UIA, which twinned Mazkeret Batia with Calgary, also helped develop a 75-hectare industrial area that is attracting high tech companies, he said.

The changes in Mazkeret Batia have proven so successful, the town is attracting olim from Ethiopia (75 families) and Russia (120 families) as well as longstanding Israelis who are moving there from other parts of the country because of the improved standard of living, he said.

Elloul believes he can transfer that success to the national scene. As chair of the 35-MK social caucus, he said, "We try to change ideas, to bring more money to social issues, especially to education."

Labor has increased the country's education budget by 35 per cent in two years, from $2 billion to $3.3 billion, he noted.

Elloul recently brought his story to United Jewish Appeal campaigners during a two-week visit to Calgary, Vancouver, Halifax, Ottawa, Kitchener and Toronto; he urged continued Canadian support for projects in Israel.

MISSION POSSIBLE

Recent United Israel Appeal of Canada missions took over 150 participants to Israel, where they heard about a variety of issues and achievements. Flanking Victor Yagoda, UIA's mission director in the Israel office (centre) are, from left, the co-chairs of two Young Leadership missions — Ross Paperman and Renee Lieberman of Montreal, and Joni Rosenthal and Gordon Wiseman of Toronto.

Krakow neighborhood silent reminder of its Jewish past

By RAY RUDOWSKI
Special to The CJN

KRAKOW, Poland — Zdzislaw Les looks out his bookstore window into a time capsule of silent memories. Les runs the Jewish Bookstore in front of a cobblestone plaza in the Krakow neighborhood of Kazimierz. Before World War II, about 68,000 Jews lived in Krakow, 40,000 in the barrio of Kazimierz.

Now only Les' bookstore, a cafe and a few museums and monuments attest to the city's Jewish heritage. "For 500 years Jews lived together with Poles and suddenly they're not there anymore, it's as if an entire world ended," says Les in Polish.

His bookstore is dedicated to bringing that world back to life. "This isn't just a place where I sell books," says Les, "it's a gathering point for people from around the world."

His bookstore has never been busier thanks in part to a recent visitor to the neighborhood. Director Steven Spielberg renewed interest in Jewish history after he chose the narrow streets of Kazimierz as the setting for his Academy Award winning masterpiece Schindler's List.

"In December, people started coming by asking 'where was the factory,' 'where was this or that'," says Les. Thus began Les' brainchild which he calls: Visit Places from Schindler's List. The two-hour tour winds its way through the parts of Krakow that played a major role in Spielberg's film.

But Les is quick to point out this is not merely a tour of film sets; this is definitely not Hollywood. Les feels this is reality. "The film is practically a documentary," he says. For this reason, Les insists the tour be more than just film trivia, he wants to take visitors for a trip through Krakow's Jewish past.

Crossing the Vistula River into the site of the former Jewish ghetto we pass over a steel bridge. It is the same bridge that Krakow's Jews marched across in 1941 as the Nazis herded them into the ghetto. Our guide explains that in the movie, Spielberg used the bridge for that scene with one small exception. Spielberg filmed the actors actually marching away from the former ghetto, it seems a TV tower on the same side would have ruined the shot's authenticity.

From there we wind our way through the cobbled streets and grey facades finally stopping at number 4 Lipowa St., the site of Oskar Schindler's former factory. During the war years, Schindler employed 750 Jews from the ghetto on this site.

Today Schindler's safe haven is still a factory, making radio parts not pots and pans. The original gate, easily recognizable in the film, and the smoke stack still remain. Our guide explains that Spielberg shot externals of the plant on the actual site but the internal shots were done elsewhere.

From here we go to the Liban Quarry. During the war, the Nazis set up a penal colony for Poles here. But Spielberg chose to build a mock-up of the Plaszow concentration camp in the quarry at a cost of $600,000 (US). Barracks were reconstructed from photos of the actual camp.

Today, the site remains an active quarry and most of the barracks and other props have been torn down. But the barbed wire entrance and the path of weathered grave stones specially constructed for the film remain.

Visited by Steven Spielberg

Our tour comes to an end in a huge field. People peacefully walk their dogs or play with children here. But its pastoral setting holds a dark secret for this is the site of the actual Plaszow death camp.

Monuments to the slain Jews are the only clues to the area's tragic past. Our guide explains that the Nazis destroyed the camp before the end of the war. The cityscape discouraged Spielberg from reconstructing the camp on the actual site.

The visitors' silence attests to the tour's impact. Jorg Henschen from Bremen, Germany, says he's deeply moved. "I want to see the places so I can better imagine what was going on," he says in broken English.

Henschen says his parents were not involved in the Nazi movement, but he still feels a sense of collective guilt for what happened. "I feel responsible about it and feel it's my duty to remember and prevent such things from happening again, and it's easier if you see the places."

His friend Elizabeth Lorenz also from Bremen shares Henschen's sentiments, "It's a kind of helplessness, you try to understand but you don't understand what happened."

Les sees many young Germans coming to him looking for answers. "One young man told me, 'our forefathers did all this and even though I'm part of the new generation, I still have a sense of responsibility,' " Les explains.

David Kosower, an American tourist, took the tour out of curiosity. "You know that in Warsaw there's nothing left of the Jewish ghetto," he says. The rapid advance of the Soviet Red Army forced the Germans to flee before being able to destroy Krakow as they did Warsaw.

Earlier Kosower visited the town of Lomza north-east of Warsaw hoping to trace his Jewish roots. His search turned up very little. "It's hard, very hard," says Kosower. "Nineteenth century Polish records are handwritten, some are in Russian, handwriting is often illegible or faded and you have to know where the records are."

Les understands. In November, he hopes to start another tour tailored to help ease the frustrations of people like Kosower. "Many young people, particularly from the United States ask about maps," says Les. Les plans to call his new tour Looking for Roots and wants to gear it to the individual. Les says he'll track down land titles and show the interested party exactly where their family lived. Several other travel agencies in Poland already offer similar packages.

In the meantime, Les notices a flurry of activity outside his bookstore window as others begin conducting tours of the sites in Schindler's List, taking over territory Les feels he once occupied exclusively. "Four thousand travel agencies in Poland and not one came up with this idea, it seemed so natural," laughs Les. But Les is proud, not angry that others have taken an interest in the neighborhood's Jewish past "The more people that know, the better."

Tickets for the tour costs about $10 (Canadian). They begin every day at 2 p.m.in front of the Jewish bookstore. The address is: Jewish Bookshop, 31-052 Krakow, ul Szeroka 2, Poland. Telephone: 21-71-66.

Ray Rudowski is a reporter with ITV News in Edmonton, Alberta.

CJN Exclusive Elaine Zeitz Pollard

The Jewish world was humming earlier this summer with the announcement that Elaine (Esther) Zeitz of Toronto, a 39-year-old educator of children with special needs, had married Jonathan Pollard, the world's most famous Jewish prisoner, in a secret jailhouse ceremony. Despite doubts in some circles about the marriage's validity, Zeitz hopes the union will lend added weight to the Pollard campaign.

A U.S. Navy civilian analyst, Pollard, now 40, was arrested in 1985 and charged under one of the lowest espionage statutes — passing classified information to an ally. He then entered a plea bargain; in return for leniency for himself and his then wife and co-accused, Anne, he would forego a trial. In 1987, at an in camera hearing, Pollard was sentenced to life imprisonment and spent the next 18 months in solitary confinement at a psychiatric facility.

From there, he went to the toughest prison in America, in Marion, Ill., where he spent 6½ years in solitary. In June 1993, he was transferred to a prison in Butner, N.C., where he and Zeitz were wed in May.

Last March, U.S. President Bill Clinton denied a commutation of Pollard's sentence, despite a plea from Israeli Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin and pressure from around the world.

For the past several years, Zeitz has headed the Canadian chapter of Citizens for Justice for Jonathan Pollard, one of over 250 such groups across North America.

The CJN's Ron Csillag spoke to her recently.

CJN: There has been some controversy over the validity of your marriage to Jonathan. Can you shed some light?

Zeitz Pollard: Jonathan and I are both observent Jews. We live our lives in full accord with Halachah. All our actions are governed by Halachah. Our marriage is in accord with Halachah. Our marriage is a private affair. We originally had no intention of sharing it with the world. It was a gesture of confidence and optimism and faith in our future, in spite of all odds, that we made.

It was a very particular set of circumstances that encouraged us to go public. Perhaps it was somewhat naive. We let it be known in the hope of establishing credibility in the most unimpeachable channel; for Jonathan's voice to be heard. We didn't realize there would be such a massive hunger for nit-picky details — the kinds of things that are really not in our best interests to share right now.

Jonathan is the most over-monitored prisoner in the American system; every detail about his life, from the smallest to the largest, is in some way, on some level, by some individual, routinely monitored. For that reason, we keep all details to a minimum. If I were to divulge details, my first preference would be to detail the way he is routinely abused, harassed, singled out. Right now, even on those specifics, I can only speak in very general terms and I truly regret that, because I feel that if Jews were aware of what he endures on a daily basis, there would righteous wrath and very justified outrage.

CJN: Rabbi Aaron Soloveichik of Chicago, the great Orthodox sage, called your marriage to Jonathan 'a joke ... null and void.' Can you comment?

Zeitz Pollard: (Sighs). For us, Torah is a very great thing and we're certainly not seeking to dishonor or insult anyone. We're at a loss to understand how it is possible to render a psak Halachah — a halachic judgment — without having any facts. Rav Soloveichik has never contacted me about the matter, never contacted Jonathan about the matter and has never spoken to anyone who was directly involved [in the marriage ceremony].

CJN: Is it fair to call you Jonathan's halachic bride?

Zeitz Pollard: Jewishly speaking, there is no other kind. Jewishly speaking, the civil marriage has no standing. For us, Halachah is everything.

CJN: Whan can you say about Jonathan's daily treatment?

Zeitz Pollard: There are repercussions against him for every detail made public. The authorities who let their displeasure be known to him, are very careful to act within the law. But the pressure that is brought to bear on him every time a disclosure is made public is enormous. And all information is used against him.

CJN: Is he subject to anti-Semitic harassment?

Zeitz Pollard: Very much so. What I can say is that Jonathan is no longer in solitary confinement, but he is singled out to be managed as if he still were, which means that even the finest details of his life are micro-managed. He is subject to a jungle of red tape and permissions and bureaucracy that no other inmate faces. And this over every single, teeny-tiny detail of his life. And I wish I could detail them.

CJN: Technically, Jonathan is eligible for parole in 1995. You are now on a vigorous campaign to get people to believe parole is not a viable alternative. Why?

Zeitz Pollard: The parole issue is a red herring and nothing more than a delaying tactic. Jonathan stands virtually no chance of being paroled.

[Alron Photos]

True, he is eligible for parole in 1995 but so are people like Charles Manson and [convicted Robert Kennedy assassin] Sirhan Sirhan, who also have absolutely no chance for parole. Jonathan has in his parole file four strong recommendations which would obviate any chance for parole. No parole board in the United States is going to go against no less personalities than U.S. attorney Joseph de Genova [who prosecuted Pollard]; the sentencing judge, Aubrey Robinson; [former defence secretary] Caspar Weinberger — who all endorsed recommendations that Jonathan never be paroled.

And then, President Bill Clinton added the icing on the cake last spring when he turned down the commutation of [Pollard's] sentence. Parole boards are [composed of] ordinary, average people who are not going to contradict the president of the United States and say they know better. Therefore, it's foolish to even continue the process when you know that the answer at the end of it will be 'no.'

Let's say just for argument's sake that Jonathan had some chance of being paroled. Parole would leave the balance of a life sentence hanging over his head and the head of Israel for the rest of his natural life. It means that if indeed parole is granted by some miracle, if at any point the authorities decided that he violated any conditions of his parole, he could immediately be re-arrested, extradited — if he was in Israel — and sent back to spend the balance of a life sentence in prison.

An issue that for the Jewish people is the most critical is that Jonathan's sentence is consistent with those meted out to enemy agents. If Jonathan gets the sentence of an enemy agent, who's the enemy? Israel! As long as the sentence remains intact, Israel has this life sentence hanging over her head as well.

CJN: Can you clear up what Jonathan was charged with and convicted of?

Zeitz Pollard: Jonathan was convicted of one count, and one count only, of passing classified information to an ally. He was never charged with treason. He couldn't be, because treason means you give aid and comfort to an enemy, and Israel is not an enemy.

He was never charged with harming the United States. Harming the U.S. is a charge that stands on its own, separate and apart. This is important because President Clinton used that as the excuse to deny clemency to Jonathan, and it's a false charge.

After nine months of polygraph testing, the CIA concluded that Jonathan was an ideologue and that he had done what he did for ideological reasons. Moreover, in the United States, when a person is found to have benefited financially from espionage, the courts routinely fine them. Jonathan was never fined. He was never charged with having benefited financially, yet that has been a major myth.

CJN: Almost all accounts of the case state that Israeli payments to Jonathan were made, whether it was Israel persuading him to take money or whether it was an unwritten rule that anyone providing this sort of information had to be paid.

Zeitz Pollard: Israel did try to insist [that Pollard be paid] and actually set up a false bank account to which Jonathan never had access. These things were investigated in minute detail and there were nine months of polygraphing that satisfied the CIA. As Alan Dershowitz points out, if Jonathan were to spy for money, major money could have been made by passing the information to enemies of Israel. A minor amount of money was recorded to have passed hands — something like $50,000 — every cent of which was accounted for to the courts, to their satisfaction that it was not for Jonathan's benefit. That did not even cover operational expenses he incurred on behalf of Israel.

CJN: You have said that this case has resulted in a de facto legal redefinition of Israel. What do you mean by that?

Zeitz Pollard: When you have an ally — Israel — and an agent working to pass information to that ally, and yet when that agent is sentenced to a term consistent with one given to a hostile agent, what does that tell us about what they are trying to say about that ally? Again and again, we keep finding this mischaracterization.

CJN: What has the punishment been for others who have spied for an ally?

Zeitz Pollard: Typically, two to four years. What's also been mind-boggling is the case of Albert Sombolay. He was an American soldier during Operation Desert Storm. He shared the U.S. plans for Desert Storm with Iraq and Jordan. He was originally sentenced to 35 years. This was the highest treason possible! After the first appeal, it was reduced to 19 years, and it's been reduced since then.

Prime Minister Rabin made a personal appeal to President Clinton [for Pollard's release]. One head of state generally doesn't approach another head of state publicly about such a request unless he has some pretty good assurances in advance that his request will be favorably received. There's no reason to invite public humiliation and rejection otherwise. President Clinton turned down Prime Minister Rabin's request in the most arrogant, high-handed manner, which showed absolutely no respect for Mr. Rabin. President Clinton could have made a gesture. He could have shown that he at least considered the plea of an ally from its head of state.

CJN: Is a presidential commutation, from this or a future president, still possible?

Zeitz Pollard: Absolutely. And we've got to press for it now. President Clinton is free to change his mind at any moment. He is free to review the case today, and tomorrow sign Jonathan's release. Frankly, that is the only morally decent and acceptable solution. Jonathan has already served twice as long as anyone else in the history of the United States who was charged with a similar offence.

CJN: What information did Jonathan pass to Israel?

Zeitz Pollard: He passed the kind of information Israel was owed according to a 1983 treaty agreement, which dealt specifically with Israel's security needs. He did come under pressure at various points during his operation to hand over information to Israel concerning the United States, and he categorically refused. He did not pass Israel any information to which she was not entitled. He handed over information concerning Iraq's nuclear capabilities; the building up of non-conventional weapons in places like Iraq, Syria and Egypt — things that directly concerned Israel.

During the Gulf War, Israelis called Jonathan 'the ghost of the sealed rooms.' The sealed rooms existed because of the warnings Jonathan had given Israel. Moreover, information Jonathan gave Israel prior to the Gulf War allowed Israel not only to prepare itself, but also to feed information to America.

CJN: How often do you communicate with Jonathan?

Zeitz Pollard: We speak every day, and that's not easy because the authorities can and do interfere with his privileges. Jonathan writes me every day. I have not received any of his letters since 1990. His letters to me are routinely confiscated and that's a direct contravention of American law. All his mail goes to Washington, where it's supposed to be vetted, not stolen. As long as the people who vet it are satisfied that it doesn't contain classified information, they are supposed to send it on to its rightful address. Roughly 70 per cent of his mail doesn't make it to its destination. I want to emphasize that this is illegal.

CJN: Why hasn't Jonathan's plight caught the imagination of the majority of the North American Jewish public?

Zeitz Pollard: I don't necessarily agree with you. I think the energy is there in the American community. Once they have been made aware of the issues, they're a good community and they do respond. The energy has to be harnessed and focused. I think this is the task of the Jewish leadership. There has been perhaps less directness from the leadership than is desirable. For various reasons, they were slow to respond. An example: Why is it that someone like [Canadian Jewish Congress president] Irving Abella has no difficulty saying that anti-Semitism is behind Pollard's fate, and yet his American counterpart waffles for years?

What has happened is that constitutent organizations have broken away from the leadership and begun issuing their own calls for commutation. And it's sad that the leadership had to wait for the constitutent organizations to act.

CJN: How did you become involved in this?

Zeitz Pollard: It was the summer of 1990, and I was in Israel working at the Ministry of Justice and teaching English at Hebrew University. I had been in touch with Shifra Hoffman, who founded Victims of Arab Terror, and she suggested I write to Jonathan, which I did. I received two envelopes in reply. One was full of information; the other was a personal letter. I had opened the information first, and read it. And then I read the letter. I expected the person who wrote it to be angry and bitter. Instead, his letter was full of love for the land and people of Israel. It was such an overwhelmingly human, patriotic, compassionate tone, that I was very touched. Thus began the beginning of our communication.

At the same time, I was shocked beyond words at what I'd read, because I'd honestly believed that America was the land of justice and democracy. I didn't believe something like that could happen in America. There was a moral imperative; you just had to get involved.

I can honestly say that my personal feelings for my husband aside, this is the kind of issue I feel very strongly concerns every Jew and every decent, law-abiding citizen in a democracy. The issues are much bigger than Jonathan and myself. They affect every citizen, and, like it or not, we are writing a page of Jewish history.

Heritage Front report released

CSIS to be probed

By AMY SATTIN and RON CSILLAG
CJN Staff Reporters

TORONTO — The League for Human Rights of B'nai Brith Canada last week released its report on the Heritage Front, just days before a parliamentary committee began weighing explosive allegations that the Canadian Security Intelligence Service (CSIS) had helped create the neo-Nazi organization.

The 37-page report, prepared as a resource for police, academics, anti-racists and the media, was unveiled last Friday at B'nai Brith's headquarters here.

It includes short biographies of important Heritage Front figures, an outline of the group's ties to North American neo-Nazi movements and its recruitment strategies.

The document was originally completed in early August, according to author Richard Berman, but was later revised to include widespread reports that supposed CSIS mole Grant Bristow may have used government funds to set up the Heritage Front.

Bristow, the Front's intelligence chief, is alleged to have been paid at least $250,000 by CSIS over a five-year period for information on Canada's far-right groups — money allegedly used to set up the Front.

The Heritage Front was co-founded by Bristow and current leader Wolfgang Droege, among others, in September 1989. It claims to have 1,800 members.

League counsel Marvin Kurz told reporters "it makes no sense" for CSIS to have paid Bristow if it knew the money was being used to create Canada's largest hate group.

He said he welcomes an investigation into the domestic spy agency. "We want the left hand to know what the right hand is doing, and we're concerned that is not what is going on now."

Bristow is also alleged to have spied on the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation and the Reform Party (where he supposedly acted as a bodyguard at party rallies), and to have passed information on Canadian Jewish organizations to American neo-Nazi leader Tom Metzger, head of White Aryan Resistance (WAR).

"Allegations of spying on Canadian Jews ... have seriously damaged the credibility of Canada's intelligence community," said Frank Dimant, executive vice-president of B'nai Brith.

Bernie Farber of Canadian Jewish Congress said he expects someone from CJC to be called as a witness before the five-member parliamentary committee, headed by Toronto-area MP Derek Lee.

The committee is expected to begin hearings this week in Ottawa.

But Sol Littman, head of the Simon Wiesenthal Centre, said he has little faith the committee will arrive at the truth, saying its final report will likely be a "rather pleasant whitewash."

Littman said he wants a broader inquiry, including an examination of ties between neo-Nazi groups and police forces — not just CSIS. The parliamentary committee can review only CSIS activities.

Littman's sentiment was supported last week by the Canadian Civil Liberties Union, the Canadian Labor Congress and the Canadian Union of Postal Workers — the latter as a result of further allegations that CSIS had spied on striking postal employees in 1987 and passed the information to Canada Post management.

Lee told The CJN on Monday the committee will focus on four main "public" allegations: That CSIS or a CSIS informer

- spied on the Reform Party;
- attempted to obtain address lists of members of Canadian Jewish Congress;
- spied on Howard Goldenthal, a researcher for CBC's Fifth Estate, who was in contact with Heritage Front leaders;
- and spied on striking postal workers.

Lee said the last allegation "is probably a zero, probably nothing." In a rare public statement last week, CSIS categorically denied the charge.

Another issue that might come before the committee is government leaks, Lee said, specifically, the allegations swirling around Brian McInnis, a former aide to then Tory solicitor general. and CSIS boss Doug Lewis. McInnis is under investigation by the RCMP over allegations he leaked the secret document that made it clear CSIS had an informant in the Heritage Front.

"But that's not a complicated issue," Lee added. "If there's a leak, you fix it."

One issue that won't be raised, Lee said, is CSIS' working relationships with foreign intelligence agencies, including Israel's Mossad.

"We know they do that," Lee said.

He said the committee will begin with witnesses from the five-member civilian watchdog that oversees the activities of CSIS, the Security Intelligence Review Committee (SIRC).

Lee said the committee does not yet have a witness list, but it's possible that Bristow himself could be subpoenaed to appear.

"First, we would have to find him," said Lee. (Bristow is said to be in hiding.) "But in order to find out what CSIS was doing, we don't have to find him."

Keegstra verdict overturned

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The Alberta Court of Appeal last week overturned the conviction of former Eckville school teacher Jim Keegstra and angered Jewish community groups in the process.

Community organizations were steaming over the timing of the judgment, which was released on Rosh Hashanah, one of the holiest days of the year.

"Those involved in determining the Alberta Court of Appeal's timing of the release of the decision. . . displayed gross insensitivity to the Jewish community. As Jews are the target group of Keegstra's venom, given our inability to respond, the decision need not have been released on one of the holiest days of the Jewish calendar," said Hal Joffe, national chair of community relations for Canadian Jewish Congress.

The release date was "an appallingly insensitive act by the court," said Frank Dimant, executive vice-president of B'nai Brith Canada. "As Jewish groups throughout Canada have been monitoring the Keegstra case for more than a decade, it is ironic that the court chose to make its decision public on a day when Jewish leaders would not be available for comment."

In its 2-1 decision, the Appeal Court ruled that the trial judge should have responded to a request by the jury for a transcript of testimony and for a further explanation of a Criminal Code section.

Jim Keegstra

Jewish groups were split on what steps Alberta Attorney General Ken Rostad should take in the wake of the judgment.

Congress urged Rostad to appeal the decision to the Supreme Court of Canada.

"These are important procedural issues," said Steven Shulman, Congress associate director of community relations. Should the High Court reverse the Alberta court's decision, Keegstra's conviction at trial would be reinstated, he said.

"A man who has twice been found guilty of violating our criminal law by poisoning the minds of young students in promoting hatred against Jews must not be allowed to escape judicial sanction," said Congress President Irving Abella.

B'nai Brith's League for Human Rights called on Rostad "to prosecute Keegstra again for his role in the spread of racism and anti-Semitism in Canada. . . Two juries have convicted Keegstra for wilfully promoting hatred. Furthermore, the Supreme Court has upheld the validity of the sections under which Keegstra was charged. Both of Keegstra's appeals have been upheld because of perceived errors in lower court procedures; the appeals are not vindications of his action," said Mark Sandler, senior legal counsel for the League.

Keegstra first came to national attention in 1982 when the former Grades 9 and 12 social studies teacher was removed from the classroom for teaching that Jews were conspiring for world domination and were behind wars, revolutions and numerous other catastrophic events.

In 1985 a jury convicted him of promoting hatred against Jews. The case eventually reached the Supreme Court of Canada, which upheld the validity of the hate crimes law.

But because of procedural errors by the trial judge, a second trial was ordered. In 1992, Keegstra was again convicted and it was that decision that the Appeal Court overturned last week.

Former JCC staff launch protest

Ghert said the LPT received $100,000 a year from the Federation and did not fully pay for its overhead costs, making it a money-loser.

The booklet claims that the Federation was partly to blame for the JCC's debt by underfunding community programs offered by the Centre.

The booklet also claims that the Federation is influencing the JCC to turn down construction of a private tennis facility on JCC land that would have netted the JCC $300,000 a year. The booklet states that in its place, the Federation proposed constructing a school for the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto (CHAT) and paying the JCC $300,000 a year in rent.

Brownstein suggested that by scotching the tennis deal and by obtaining the JCC land, the Federation could save $300,000 in rental fees.

Zbar discounted that suggestion. Pointing to the $5 million that the Federation is planning to put into the facility to pay off part of the bank loan, he said "that would be an expensive way to build a school. It's better if there would be a healthy JCC."

The booklet claims that "budgets for community programs taken on by the JCC have risen to $1.8 million of which only $800,000 had been funded by the Federation, leaving an annual deficit of $1 million."

Ghert questioned that contention. "That may or may not be correct. We don't know. . . Their books are in such poor order, their accounting so bad, you couldn't rely on their costing," he said.

Zbar said that if the JCC felt it was losing money on the programs, it should have declined to operate them beyond budget limitations.

Brownstein contended that other JCCs in North America receive much greater subsidies from local federations. The Chicago JCC, for example, gets 40 per cent of its budget in that way while in Toronto the figure is only eight per cent, he said.

Brownstein said the JCC always expected the Federation to help it financially. "What is the role of the Federation?" he asked. "They're the umbrella organization that provides moral support, lay people and financial support. . . We went wrong by accepting responsibility in [community programing] without compensation. The biggest mistake Paul Brownstein did in the last 10 years was putting myself and the agency in the hands of the Federation."

"The Federation's intention all along has been to save the institution," Zbar said. The Federation does not have "a Machiavellian scheme to take over the JCC."

He said the Federation has bailed out the JCC repeatedly in the past few years. The Federation advanced funds to allow the JCC to meet its payroll and pay utilities. It convinced Revenue Canada last May to limit a garnishee order on the JCC to allow it to pay employees and utilities ahead of the federal government, which is still owed $520,000 in unremitted payroll deductions. That allowed the JCC to continue operating, he said.

"For the JCC, which is an independent agency with its own board and officers and which receives only eight per cent of its funds from the Federation, to then blame the Federation for its difficulties is just unacceptable," he said. "The board of directors and the management have to take responsibility for what's happened there over the last decade."

Syria seen key to peace

"I think the only value his remarks had was to tell the Golan settlers to 'cool it,' since there was no deal already worked out with Syria," a source said.

Another source noted that Rabin was wrong to imply Israel could begin renegotiating with Damascus after three years of normalization, since he already knows that Syria wants the entire package negotiated up front, although it could be implemented in phases.

The sources confirm that both Israel and Syria are adamantly holding to their positions on the duration of withdrawal, with Damascus insisting on no more than one year and Jerusalem insisting on five years.

No breakthrough has been made on one of the stickiest issues: the scope of security arrangements, the sources said. Syria has not budged from its insistence that any limited forces zone on both sides of the Golan Heights be symmetrical, which Israel rejects.

While aides to Foreign Minister Shimon Peres continue floating ideas aimed at shoring up Israel-Syria negotiations, U.S. sources said they believe the current format — with Christopher shuttling between the leaders of both countries — will continue.

According to reports arriving at the Foreign Ministry over the weekend, Syrian Foreign Minister Farouk Shara told his British counterpart Douglas Hurd privately last week that he believes an Israeli-Syrian peace agreement could be reached within six months. U.S. sources also believe such a timetable is realistic.

According to other reports reaching the ministry, Shara privately told his Dutch counterpart several days ago that he thinks a "skeletal" agreement could be struck with Israel within the next month.

NAME GAME

There is a story in almost every Jewish surname and Toronto lawyer FRED M. CATZMAN has been researching their origins over the past few years. Mr. Catzman reports on his research in The CJN.

SOLWAY — TOBIAS — FUNT — FOLBERG — KESTENBERG

Stephen H. Fuller, of Willowdale, parades five ancestral surnames for analysis:

Solway — from Solovey, Slavic for nightingale; Tobias — from the Hebrew word Tov (good); Funt — a pound in Jewish; Folberg — from the German Wohlberg — good mountain; Kestenberg — from Kasten — a box or chestnut and Berg — mountain.

The News in Brief

Bomb Claims Two Hamas Members

TEL AVIV — Two members of the Islamic fundamentalist movement Hamas blew themselves up over last weekend while installing a bomb in a car south of the West Bank town of Nablus. According to security sources, the bomb was intended for an attack in Israel during Rosh Hashanah.

The activists, from Kabatiye, near the West Bank town of Jenin, are believed to be linked "at least indirectly" to the perpetrators of last April's bomb attacks in Afula and Hadera, the source said.

The murder of two Israelis in Ramla last month was followed by Hamas messages saying there would be two more attacks by the year's end.

A Palestinian from the West Bank discovered the mangled remains of the two terrorists and reported them to the police.

Another attempted attack reportedly went awry in Nablus on Aug. 31, when suspected members of Hamas set off a bomb made of cooking-gas cylinders.

Seven residents were injured in the blast, which was at first thought to have been a domestic accident, but later was believed to be intended for another holiday attack.

New Poll on Golan

JERUSALEM — Sixty-four per cent of Israelis support at least a partial withdrawal from the Golan Heights in exchange for peace with Syria, according to a survey released last weekend.

The survey, commissioned by Israel Radio and conducted by Haifa University researchers, polled 853 Israelis.

The radio said 27 per cent of respondents supported full withdrawal and another 37 per cent backed a partial withdrawal from the heights, if Syria signed a full peace accord. It said 34 per cent were against any territorial compromise on the Golan.

Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin hinted this month that he could agree to a total withdrawal under the right circumstances but said any "meaningful" withdrawal would be put to a referendum.

The report said 24 per cent of Israelis have changed their views over the past year against trading land for peace and now favored some kind of withdrawal.

Ethiopian Suicide Rate High

JERUSALEM — The suicide rate among Ethiopian immigrants is three to six times that of the general Israeli population, according to a recent study.

The study also found that the typical person who commits suicide among the Ethiopian immigrant community is a relatively young man, married but with marital difficulties, who appears depressed but doesn't express suicidal intent, and often visits his family doctor.

This profile is very different from suicides in other immigrant groups and of Israelis in general.

The study was based on 49 Ethiopian emigres who committed suicide between January 1983 and September 1992.

The suicide rate among Ethiopians was many times higher than that in the general Jewish population, which is six to eight per 100,000.

The study's authors suggest that the great "acculturation stress" on the immigrants, which is "unprecedented" among all the immigrant groups in Israel, is responsible for the "serious demoralization" among those newcomers suffering from psychopathology.

Shanghai Consulate Opens

SHANGHAI — Israel's Consulate General here was officially Sept. 5, when the Foreign Ministry's Moshe Ram presented his credentials to a representative of the Chinese Foreign Ministry.

The Shanghai representation is the first official Israeli office in China apart from the embassy in Beijing.

Until Japan's occupation of China during World War II, Shanghai was home to a sizeable and wealthy Jewish colony, established by Jews fleeing Russia and, later, the Nazis.

Most Jews left the city after the war.

Israel and China established diplomatic relations in January 1992.

Rum told Israel Radio in a telephone interview that he had spent his first days in China beginning to learn Chinese ("a somewhat difficult tongue to master") and looking for accommodations.

El Al Flights to Hong Kong

TEL AVIV — El Al will open a new charter route to Hong Kong starting in October as the result of an agreement signed with several Far East air carriers.

Under the new arrangement, passengers from Tel Aviv can book flights on El Al to Hong Kong. From there, they will be able to take flights aboard various Far Eastern airlines at sharply discounted prices to such destinations as Japan, Singapore, the Philippines and Taiwan.

The more than 13-hour flight between Tel Aviv and Hong Kong, aboard Boeing 767 planes, will have a refueling stop in Bombay.

Group fare tickets to and from Hong Kong will cost $1,149 (U.S.) in October and drop to $1,049 in November. Fares will cost between $1,388 and $1,599 for the additional destinations aboard the other participating airlines.

Prize Money to Scholarships

BEERSHEVA — Israeli Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin and Foreign Minister Shimon Peres have contributed the money they received from the UNESCO Peace Prize to scholarships for demobilized soldiers studying at Ben-Gurion University of the Negev (BGU), announced Avishay Braverman, BGU president, recently. The prize is worth approximately $71,000 (U.S.)

Parley on Jewish Issues

LUBLIN — Bar-Ilan University and the Marie Curie Sklodowskiej University in Lublin joined forces recently to sponsor an international conference on Contemporary Issues in Jewish Law and Ethics.

The conference, attended by about 80 people, was held in the one-time Yeshivat Chachmei Lublin, a leading yeshiva in the pre-war Polish Jewish community. Presenters included Israel's Chief Ashkenazi Rabbi Israel Lau; Emanuel Rackman, chancellor of Bar-Ilan University; and Rabbi David Bleich, professor of law at Yeshiva University.

Youth Club Opens

LODZ — Commemorating the 50th anniversary of the brutal liquidation of the Lodz ghetto, Jewish officials opened a Jewish youth club here recently.

Rabbi Michael Schudrich, an American who is director in Poland of the Ronald S. Lauder Foundation, was instrumental in opening the club.

Jewish leaders in Lodz, a city that once had a thriving Jewish community known worldwide, addressed a gathering that included numerous guests and young people.

Israeli Wanted in Theft

BUDAPEST — Interpol has issued an arrest warrant for an Israeli citizen suspected of involvement in last year's theft of a priceless collection from the Jewish Museum here, according to Hungarian media reports.

The man, identified as Arie Bakal, is a Romanian-born Israeli. The 51-year-old Bakal is reportedly a popular figure in the flea market in Jaffa.

He is the third suspect in what has been described as the biggest theft of Judaica this century.

The precious items, stolen last December, were recently discovered in Romania and returned to Budapest, where they have again been put on display.

All the suspects have been described as of Romanian origin. One of them is being held by police in Germany and reportedly will be extradited to Budapest by mid-September.

The other is believed to be at large in Austria, and unlike the suspect in Germany, cannot be extradited to Hungary under existing law.

Israel Beats Poland

RAMAT GAN — A two-goal salute by Israel on the eve of Rosh Hashanah gave local soccer fans something to cheer about at long last, as the national team scored a 2-1 win over Poland in the European Championship qualifying Group 1 match here.

Israel's win was all the more satisfying as it broke a five-year jinx in which the team failed to win a competitive international match at home.

The last time home fans went away happy was when Israel beat New Zealand 1-0 in the World Cup qualifier in March 1989. Some 42,000 were on hand for that victory, while last week's win was witnessed by a paltry 3,500 spectators.

Israel's hero was Betar Jerusalem's 24-year-old Ronnen Harazi who performed his striker's role to perfection, netting both goals.

Something Fishy in Israel...

JERUSALEM — The Israel Consumer Council has analyzed the contents of canned gefilte fish available in the country, and found that not one out of the five brands surveyed was up to standard.

The study, carried out at the Standards Institution's chemicals and foods laboratories, found that in all cases — Manischewitz, Rokeach, Hadag Hameyuhad, Dag Shean and Mittel — the percentage of fish meat was too low.

Sukkot

By RABBI AARON LEVINE

Recently I attended a meeting where a non-Jewish speaker asked the audience to respond immediately, with the first thing that came to mind, to the following questions: "What one word would you use to describe the world in which we live today?"

I responded with a word he claimed four out of five people use to answer the question — chaos, or chaotic. (How did you fare?)

We live in the most technologically advanced era. We are, by and large, wealthier than ever before. We have more comforts and conveniences than ever before. You can enter the circular driveway to your two-acre mansion, complete with tennis courts and swimming pool, and from there program your house robot to percolate your favorite blend of coffee, or run your bath, or turn on the 40-inch television screen, or press your pants so you can don a fresh crisply pressed pair, or warm you prepared supper in the programmable microwave — and G-d only knows the hundreds of other things you can do before you even set foot in the door!

We generally work less hours than ever before resulting in more weekly leisure time. We take more vacations than previous decades, we take more time off during work for coffee breaks, luncheons, gym exercise and spa time.

And yet we live in a truly chaotic time. More wars, more disease, more suffering, more poverty, more illness — cancer, AIDS, heart attacks, mental illnesses and depression — more greed, lust and depravities that may not have even existed in Sodom and Gemmorah, more crime — murders, rapes, theft, drugs — even those not yet in their teen years are doing all of the above; and a host of other ills that plague our societies, countries, and the world. There is hardly a corner on earth — yes, even in our own holy land of Israel — that is spared the afflictions of all or some of the above.

A strange paradox, is it not? Not really. Upon reflection we will see that the Torah teaches us the two go mostly hand in hand. And that's what the lessons of Sukkot are all about.

Sukkot is called Zeman Simchaseinu (the Time, the Festival of our Rejoicing). What is true rejoicing, real simchah — happiness, real wealth? And why during the only festival called by this name are we commanded to leave the warmth, comfort, and convenience of our homes and go outside to eat, learn, sleep (many still do even that) in a flimsy sukkah, which however nicely decorated and fortified cannot compare to the homes in which we live?

Think for a moment about some of the following statements (forgive me for combining the sacred with the secular, but it is not only the Torah or the rabbis who have given the same advice.)

"He who loves money will never be satisfied with money." (Ecclesiastes 5:9). "Who is rich? He who is satisfied with his lot." (Avos 4:1). "For at death he will take nothing with him, his wealth will not follow him to the grave." (Psalms 49:18). "Accursed thirst for gold! What dost thou not compel mortals to do?" (Virgil). "How few our real wants, and how vast our imaginary ones." (Lavater). "I have learned to seek happiness by limiting my desires rather than in attempting to satisfy them." (John Stuart Mill). "No man dies with ever having attained even a half of his physical desires." (Midrash Ecclesiastes Rabbah 1:34; 2:12).

We can go on and on. But the message is the same. If the goal in life is satisfying the physical appetites, if that is one's definition of happiness, then no man or woman will ever be truly happy or satisfied. The more you have the more you want, teaches the Talmud. There is never enough. Life is a constant struggle to keep up with the Joneses.

Yes we all need certain material basics, and material wealth can lead to much blessing when that wealth is used for more enduring purposes. Poverty can destroy us and shatter our dreams and souls. But it is the realization that in and of themselves, wealth and all other material possessions and pleasures used only for hedonistic motivations will lead to an unsatisfying life, creating only unhappiness and bringing chaos in the lives of individuals and the world at large.

What do we need to do in order to be content with our lot in life, in order to free ourselves from envy, greed and covetousness and an incessant pursuit of materialism? What do we need to do in order to attain true inner happiness, contentment and peace of mind? We must establish an entirely new set of priorities and a new system of values and standards. We must dispense entirely with the norms that society has established which equates success with the acquisition of power and material wealth.

Rabbi Hirsch writes the following: "It is not how much or how little you have that makes you great or small, but how much or how little you are with what you have, how much or how little you utilize what has been lent to you for action in the service of G-d — that is which makes you great or small. And if with your little you have fulfilled three quarters of your duties, while another with his plenty has done only one quarter of his, even if this one quarter were incomparably more than the three quarters you have done, you are still greater than he." (Horeb, vol. 1, p. 46).

As we temporarily leave our secure homes to enter the world of the sukkah, we are reminded it is our secure homes in this world that truly are our temporary abodes. The permanent abode of man is an eternal abode in another world. The way to build that eternal home is to realize that true wealth and happiness is attained by hoarding spiritual assets, not material ones.

The Talmud tells us how King Munvaz responded to his family's accusations of squandering the family fortune when he gave it away to alleviate the suffering of the poor in a time of famine.

"My fathers hoarded treasure that is stored only on earth; I have stored my treasure in Heaven. My fathers hoarded treasure in a place where other hands could take it; I have stored my treasure where no hand can reach it. My fathers stored treasure which bears no fruit; I have stored treasures which bear fruits. My fathers hoarded treasures of money; I have stored treasures of souls. My fathers gathered for others; I have gathered treasure for myself. My fathers gathered treasure in this world; I have stored treasure in the World to Come." (Bava Basra 11a).

May we merit the pursuit of true wealth and happiness and by so doing help make the world a little less chaotic. Chag Somayach!

Rabbinical Reflections

By RABBI AARON LEVINE

I have already clarified in my Sukkot article of this issue the Torah concept of wealth; of simchah; why Sukkot is called Zeman Simchaseinu; and how the practical consequences of this concept are manifested by the injunction to leave our homes and temporarily take up abode in our flimsy sukkot. I would like to extend that discussion with a thought from the great Maggid (Preacher) of Dubnow.

"Vanity of vanities," says Koheles (King Solomon), "all is vanity." What is the reason for the repetition of the words vanity, and why is King Solomon called Koheles?

Says the Dubnow Maggid: men and women are not all similar in their pursuits in life, in the goals they set for themselves and for that which they strive.

This is certainly so when it comes to physical and material pursuits. One lusts for power and will spend a lifetime in its pursuit, sacrificing family, friends, scruples, and anything that stands in the way of that acquisition. One craves the hoarding of wealth, thirsts for gold — independent of the power that wealth may bring. Another craves sensual gratifications, and life is used for the attainment of those pleasures. There are literally scores of pursuits that the body and the physical aspects of man desire.

At the end, when men and women are about to leave this world they realize their pursuits lead nowhere, certainly not to eternity. They spent their whole lives pursuing a dead-end path. Is that why they were placed here on this earth? Is that why they had to endure the vicissitudes of life? All the tzuris, all the pain and hardships? For there is no man or woman who escapes those entirely.

So each man thinks to himself, "Well if I had only pursued the path of my friend, that would have been worthwhile. Mine only led to futility." The grass is always greener on the other side of the fence.

Comes along King Solomon, the wisest of all men, and teaches us that it is not so. "I am Koheles (the word in Hebrew means to gather together). Because of my position, my power, my wealth, my wisdom, I have been enabled to gather together, to try out all of the various paths and pursuits in life. Don't make the mistake of thinking that only your path was futile but that of your neighbor was fruitful and a happy one. I tell you there is not one that ultimately leads to lasting satisfaction. All physical pursuits lead nowhere if they are utilized only for the sake of purely being a physical acquisition — hakol hevel, all is vanity."

This can be compared, says the Dubnow Maggid, to a man who meets a company of blind men and wishing to sport with them says out loud, "Here are some gold coins, there are enough for each of you to have several coins. Share them with your friends." The blind men begin to crowd around the man they believe to have the gold coins, demanding their share. But in truth, there were no gold coins. Their supposedly generous benefactor was only toying with them. But they all continue to fight, believing there will be gold coins for each of them.

So it is with mankind. The yetzer hora sports with them. He dangles the glitter of gold, the sparkle of earthly pursuits that gleam in the eye of the beholder. And all begin to fight, to run, to sweat, to toil, to pursue those illusive "gold coins" of happiness and material bliss.

The Midrash (Pirkei d'Rabbi Eliezer chapter 34) says there are three things beloved to man during his life — his family, his money, and his good deeds. When his time comes to depart from this earth he calls his family together and pleads with them to save him from the Day of Judgment. But they only respond, "We cannot help you. Don't you know that there is no mastery at the day of death."

He calls upon his money and says, "I have toiled all my life, day and night, to acquire you. Save me now from this death and its judgment." And the response is again the same, "Don't you know that wealth cannot help at the time of death." Then he calls to his good deeds and asks them for their help and they respond, "Go in peace, we shall precede you before you arrive over there, as it says, 'And your righteousness shall go before you and the glory of HaShem shall gather you in (Isaiah 58:8)'."

To the extent that we pursue the material to enable us to use it for spiritual purposes; to provide charity and chesed and material comfort to others; to the extent that we pursue a life of Torah learning and mitzvah observance — ah, that will lead to paths of eternity. We will leave this world with feelings of true accomplishment.

And, strangely enough, if these are our goals then the Almighty will bless us with the material good that will afford us the peace of mind and wherewithal to be able to do those good deeds, as Maimonides explains at length (laws of teshuva, chapter 9). May we be blessed with the desire to attain these goals, and by so doing acquire true and everlasting wealth! Amen.

Clintons join worshippers for Rosh Hashanah service

Jewish Telegraphic Agency

NEW YORK — There was a surprise waiting for worshippers at Rosh Hashanah services in Martha's Vineyard last week: President Bill Clinton and First Lady Hillary Rodham Clinton sitting in the front row, wishing the congregants a "Shanah Tovah."

It is believed to be the first time that a U.S. president has attended a High Holiday service.

The Clintons, who were vacationing on the island off the coast of Massachusetts, were invited by the rabbi and a prominent congregant to attend New Year's services at the Martha's Vineyard Hebrew Centre. It is the only Jewish house of worship on the island.

According to Rabbi Joshua Plaut, spiritual leader of the Reform congregation, the idea to invite the president originated with his mother, who lives in Jerusalem.

"She suggested that I invite the president," said Rabbi Plaut, a nephew of Rabbi Gunther Plaut of Toronto. "I didn't think it would work, but she said it was the right thing to do, and I didn't want to enter the new year with a guilty conscience" over not heeding his mother. So he sent the president a letter of invitation.

Alan Dershowitz, a Harvard Law School professor and well-known attorney, was able to get the rabbi's letter, along with one of his own, through to the president. Clinton quickly accepted the invitation.

The president and the First Lady arrived at the Monday evening services promptly, although entry was slightly delayed for the congregants because of the security measures.

"When we arrived for services there was a line of people waiting to get in, a metal detector and Secret Service crawling all over the place," said attorney Martin Fox, a congregant.

The First Couple sat in the front row with Dershowitz and Sen. Frank Lautenberg, also a member of the congregation.

The Clintons sang many of the prayers, including the Shema, along with the Jewish worshippers. They were able to follow along with the transliterated prayerbooks used by the congregation.

The president, who is Baptist, "honored the spirit of diversity and religious pluralism in this country with his presence," said Rabbi Plaut.

Before blowing a long blast on the shofar, the ram's horn used throughout the High Holidays, the rabbi explained to the president that a shofar is "sort of like a Jewish saxophone," alluding to Clinton's famous love of that instrument.

In his remarks to the president and congregation, Rabbi Plaut said he "explained the significance of Rosh Hashanah as a period of repentance and renewal, the whole concept of a book of life and that we inscribe our own destiny as G-d guides our hand.

"I spoke about peace, how he will go down in Jewish history as an important contributor to peace for Israel and her neighbors.

"When Israel is at peace Jews all over the world are at peace and I urged him to complete the comprehensive peace in the region," Rabbi Plaut said.

The president then ascended the bimah and said there was still a lot of work ahead to make the (Israeli-Palestinian) accord work.

The congregation gave him a standing ovation.

Rabbi Plaut also presented the president with a Moroccan Torah pointer made of sterling silver and a copy of the Reform movement's Bible, which includes commentaries by his uncle, Rabbi Gunther Plaut.

Inside the cover of the Bible, Rabbi Joshua Plaut wrote a note to the president saying "he honored us with his presence, thanking him for his role in the Middle East peace agreements and wishing him luck in pursuit of his domestic agenda."

The service on the first night of Rosh Hashanah was the largest the congregation, and the island, had ever seen.

An estimated 650 worshippers — triple the number of member families — crowded in to Edgartown's Old Whaling Church, an historic local building no longer used as a church, which had been rented out by the congregation for the services.

Though the president's plans to attend the synagogue had been kept secret until about an hour before services began, the crowd was still expected to be large.

The congregation has grown in recent years and the fact that the first night of Rosh Hashanah fell on Labor Day this year meant that many Jews extended their vacations to include the Jewish holiday.

Fox, one of the members, said he was not at all surprised that the president came to Rosh Hashanah services.

"He does everything up here, goes to all the stores and restaurants, goes sailing and fishing, and it's a small town."

"The biggest Rosh Hashanah service in the history of the island was taking place while he was here, so it made sense for him to come."

Outlook: what is to become of the seeds of 5754

By YESHAYAHU ANUG

Though the year's theme was peace, it was still a distant target at year's end. If peace looks more obtainable now than it ever did, this is because the concept of change and its dynamics have dominated the scene with the declared purpose of revising realities and transforming mentalities.

The year 5754 was encouraging in spite of the many aches and pains of peacemaking. A few initial obstacles caused by the sharp rejection of those who fear change were narrowed on both sides and, on the whole, the perseverance of the few was stronger than the scepticism of the many who want change, yet don't believe it is a realistic goal. So the drive to a different Middle East must cope not only with the obstructionism of its opponents, but also with the inhibitions and insecurities of its initiators and of their supporters.

Major transformations in history are made by new leaders not personally accountable for old policies, but here the pioneers of change are also the principal veterans of the long conflict. They have now changed course, but some of them are still more at home with the worn-out slogans of confrontation than they are with the language of conciliation. This is why their rhetoric is accident-prone and often damages their own policies. More than any other factor, their performance will determine the outcome of last year's decision to defy the fatalism of pointless strife.

The new year 5755 shall affect the political future of all the partners to the process. It is a pre-election year — or may be even an electoral one — for Yitzhak Rabin and his performance will either secure his re-election or return the country to a Likud-led government, with an agenda which is for now very difficult to make out.

Yeshayahu Anug

It will also be a crucial year for President Bill Clinton, whose administration is about to undergo mid-term congressional elections. What will not be accomplished by Rabin and Clinton during the year will not be done during the next, and what was achieved till now may well be lost for another long period of unforeseeable developments.

In Israel, the apprehension regarding the implementation of the Oslo agreement with the PLO, a mere starter for a regional peace that must also accomodate a complex solution with Syria and Lebanon, is not the monopoly of the opposition. It is shared in part by some of the staunchest supporters of the ongoing process and go a long way to explain the slow motion and the zig-zagging of the government. But the strident political debate here obscures the fact that while the government dares to shake the status quo, which in its view can only lead to more conflict, the opposition has no true alternative to offer but to perpetuate it.

So what's new? New is the active support of the Israeli government's efforts by the international community. The rationale behind this new attitude is simple. While the perils of world-conflagration are gone, because the bi-polar world is no more, new ethnic conflicts, fueled by past discriminations and by abysmal economic and social conditions, have errupted in many places and are jeopardizing world stability.

In this new reality, the Mideastern peace process, whatever its many hiccups, acquired singular importance; it has become the only functioning prototype for easing other conflicts. Its very existence offers the international community an irresistible opportunity to help. It may have already prompted the parties to the Northern Ireland conflict to follow the example. A close look at Belfast will not only discover striking similarities but almost identical reactions elicited by the sudden accord: the same doubts, the same fears, the same hopes — all expressions of similar human emotions.

The mobilization of western financial resources and incentives to pad the fragile peace construction in our region is impressive. The scheme may work, though for now the political establishment outside the area is more optimistic about the outcome than the parties directly engaged in working out its details and who are often discouraged by the complexity of the issues.

The seeds of change have now been planted in the arid soil of Mideastern inertia. To survive, these seeds must be carefully nursed and defended against foreseeable storms. The year that was, the first of this new course, was actually better than could have been expected. What will happen from now on will depend — as far as Israel's onus is concerned — on the skill of Rabin to steer his government, with its fragile parliamentary support, along the uneasy path of give and take with the Arab side, as well as on lasting international support. Even so, setbacks of different types, some dangerous, will have to be overcome.

But these prospects are somewhat clouded by the lack of a reliable assessment of Yasser Arafat's ability to properly handle the autonomous areas within his responsibility and those that will gradually be handed over to him in the months ahead. His constituency in Gaza is poor, very frustrated and impatient. The massive unemployment and misery will not improve soon, however actively the international community — including Israel — will try to help materially. Islamic fundamentalism, with means of its own, is waiting in the wings ready to inherit control should the PLO administration fail.

Moreover, Arafat's authoritarian style of leadership and his up to recently terror-oriented organization are not exactly what state-building under such circumstances requires. He has been met throughout his long years of struggle by many world figures and has by now been seen by some Israeli politicians — yet nobody is willing to estimate whether he has the flexibility to fulfill the expectations of his own people and of his peace partners. This open question will also get its final answer during the crucial year that just started.

Does the wheel have to be reinvented?

By DR. JOSEPH BERGER

The Task Force on Jewish Continuity of the Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto has published and presented its report, based on two years of interviews and discussions with a wide range of people.

Jewish continuity has become the issue of the '90s — so far — perhaps because of the great concern over the other two words that make up the official title of the report, "Assimilation and Intermarriage."

With the recent revelation that the North American intermarriage rate is running at close to 60 per cent, and that only a tiny proportion of those who intermarry bring up their children as Jews, responsible Jewish individuals and communities in many parts of the world — not just North America — have become very concerned about these trends, and want to do something positive to reverse them.

But while the good intentions of the Federation and of the people who devoted their time and efforts to this report must be appreciated and applauded, there is a glaring omission in the report that must arouse serious concern, especially in view of the community's intention to divert a very considerable sum of money to service the proposed new action committee on Jewish continuity.

That money will inevitably have to be withdrawn from other programs on the basis that the new structure or approach will presumably make a fundamental difference to the future of the Toronto Jewish community.

What is the glaring omission? The three key words representing the major problem areas that the task force was supposed to focus on are continuity, assimilation and intermarriage.

But there is one portion of the Jewish community where continuity at the moment runs at close to 100 per cent, with so few drop-outs that when they occur they become the focus of learned papers by renowned sociologists.

There is one group within the wider Jewish community that has an assimilation rate that is zero or close to it, and one group that has an intermarriage rate of zero, or virtually non-existent.

That group of course is the chassidic community, which also happens — not coincidentally — to be the fastest growing group within the wider Jewish community.

Perhaps because there is virtually no major chassidic presence in Toronto, the Federation task force thought it impractical to explore what makes the major chassidic movements successful.

But it seems to me to have been a startling deficiency on the part of the task force that it makes absolutely no reference in its report to the one sector of the community that seems to be doing something right, at least in those defined areas of crisis that Jewish communities are currently experiencing.

Surely the committee did not think it unnecessary, or inappropriate, or unhelpful, or irrelevant, to find out what it is that the chassidic movements are doing that seems to maintain and even increase their numbers, that has enabled them after almost being decimated in the Holocaust to keep their kids, in a way that almost no other sector has been able to do.

Satmar and Bobov, Belz and Ger may not be everybody's taste (certainly not their politics), and Boro Park and Monsey and Antwerp and London and Israel may be far away. But for a task force that proposes to spend more than $1 million of community money would it have been too much over a two-year period to have some consultations with chassidic leaders and at least offer the Toronto community some of their insights on why they have succeeded where so many have sadly failed?

Not for a moment am I suggesting that the answer to the problem of Jewish continuity is for large sections of the less committed, less observant, more secular community to rush out and join up with a chassidic group. For one thing, most authentic chassidic groups have for a long time not believed in proselytizing, but have preferred to grow internally and not dilute their traditions and family connections with enthusiastic new arrivals who may not have the resilience to stay the course of what can be a very rewarding — but very different way — of life.

And I certainly recognize that the report is directed to the problem of reaching those who are very very far away from community and Jewish involvement and identification.

But did the committee really believe that you can learn nothing from what works? Does the wheel always have to be reinvented?

Black anti-Semitism revisited

By MARVIN FREMES

Below you will find my reaction to the recent Rabbi Marmur article in The CJN.

Rabbi Marmur has admirably expressed the frustration we Jews and others experience in dealing with black anti-Semitism. He is a prestigious man of obvious good will who, despite constant rebuffs, is still continuing his quest for dialogue with members of the black community.

He extracts the essence from Charles Mills' lecture, that black anti-Semitism finds its roots in the Christian upbringing of many blacks which condones anti-Semitism, their identity with the oppressed Palestinians (many blacks embrace the Muslim religion), the association of Jews with slumlords in American ghettos, and envy in the evident rise of many Jews to affluence. Mills might have added that Jews are also the target of the frustration and anger directed at all whites by alienated blacks. Also, in addition to their feeling that Jewish rejection of affirmative action is designed to hold them back, blacks, for some reason, accuse Jews of being pre-Civil War slave owners.

In Toronto, the Show Boat incident inflamed the feelings of anti-Semitism already present in some sections of the black community. In this connection, it is frightening to note that many members of the black middle and professional classes embrace the anti-Semitic tenets of the Nation of Islam.

All the Show Boat principals — writer Edna Ferber, lyricist Oscar Hammerstein, producer Garth Drabinsky and mayor Mel Lastman — are Jewish. The Jewish people of Toronto, with a few notable exceptions, either refused to stand up and protest with the blacks or manifested their classic knee-jerk reaction to anti-Semitism — anger and rejection. This apathy and/or outrage on the part of the Jewish community added fuel to the feelings of resentment and impotency in the black community.

As a partial excuse, Rabbi Marmur cites Jewish affinity for a classic liberal value — freedom of speech. This valid concern must always be tempered with a sensitivity to the hurts that might be inflicted (remember The Merchant of Venice).

However, one must always keep in mind that though the vitriol of black anti-Semitism is hard to take, blacks are virtually without power in Canada and the United States. It is this reality of powerlessness which may be at the heart of their rage, their frustration and their anti-Semitism.

Rabbi Marmur is just one of many prominent people who have banged their heads against this wall of black indifference. Rabbi W. Gunther Plaut and former Lt.-Gov. Lincoln Alexander (a black himself) are among these who have also tried to reach out and failed. Rabbi Marmur pledges to continue his crusade despite the slings and arrows he expects from those in his own congregation and in the Jewish community as a whole.

In my opinion, there is something definitely awry here. Why are eminent men of obvious good will shunned in their attempts to reach out to the black community? Surely this must be the first task, to establish the reasons for this. Normally when people of good will from one side reach out, there usually is at least one hand there to greet them. By and large this is not true at present. Whatever it is, be it anger, frustration, alienation, envy etc., the reasons for this wall of indifference and rejection must be ascertained before any meaningful dialogue can begin.

As a beginning, we might look at this phenomenon of "competitive victimhood." Both Jews and blacks try to outdo each other in this contest. Any concession by either side could be seen as a partial defeat. For instance, black university kids, privileged as they are, support the anti-Semitism of the Nation of Islam partly to show their support for their less fortunate brethren in the ghettos. They fear the consequences of letting the side down.

For Jews, the Holocaust might be seen in the same light. It is important to make sure we never forget its horror, and to prevent it from ever happening again. But conceding the higher moral ground of victimhood to blacks is a defeat of sorts — in other words, letting the side down. When both blacks and Jews realize this is a mug's game and see that they both can afford to let their guard down, perhaps a beginning can be made towards commencing a dialogue.

The fact that, at this point anyway, blacks are more reluctant to communicate could be seen as reflection of their relative powerlessness with the resultant fear that reaching out might be seen as a sign of weakness — again of letting the side down.

Black anti-Semitism and Jewish anti-black racism are poisons that threaten to destroy civil society and as such require our urgent attention. Because we Jews are in the fortunate position of relative security, we should not be afraid of taking the first step and proceed without being arrogant or patronizing in the quest for knowledge, understanding and brotherhood. We have little to lose and much to gain in this enterprise.

New relations

Morocco's decision to establish formal diplomatic relations with Israel, announced on the eve of Rosh Hashanah, is one more indicator that the peace process is working.

The latest development comes on the heels of Jordan's historic move to end its state of war with Israel. It's clear that the momentum toward a just and lasting peace in the Middle East is rooted in Israel's rapprochement with the PLO, which would have been inconceivable just a few short years ago.

Without the now-famous Rabin-Arafat handshake in Washington last year, neither King Hassan II of Morocco nor King Hussein of Jordan would have been tempted to embark on the path of conciliation and cooperation with Israel. Having been convinced that Israel's agreement with the PLO was not merely a futile exercise, they felt free to shore up their heretofore clandestine ties with Israel.

It is not really surprising that Morocco has become the second Arab country after Egypt to formalize its links with Israel. King Hassan II, like his late father, has long enjoyed cordial relations with Morocco's Jewish community and with Moroccan Jews living abroad, including Israel and Canada.

Furthermore, despite its fealty to the Palestinian and Arab cause, Morocco has never exhibited a fanatical attitude to Israel. Indeed, Morocco played an indispensable role as a mediator in arranging Anwar al-Sadat's astonishing 1977 visit to Jerusalem. In 1976 and again in 1986, King Hassan II welcomed an Israeli prime minister to Rabat for talks on the prospects for peace. And in September 1993, Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin and Foreign Minister Shimon Peres stopped in Rabat to give the Moroccan leadership a first-hand briefing of the Declaration of Principles that Israel and the PLO had just signed. Since then, Israel and Morocco have entered into economic and cultural accords that presage a mutually beneficial relationship in other spheres of interest.

The road to a comprehensive and equitable settlement of the Arab-Israeli conflict has been and will be bumpy. But with the formalization of relations between Israel and Morocco, yet another obstacle has been removed.

A vow to keep

The first 15 days of Tishrei are a roller-coaster excursion through the valleys and peaks of human emotion, the deep and difficult terrain of the human psyche and the human heart.

The trip begins with anticipation, excitement and anxiety. We are thankful for the opportunity, again, to see the changes in the seasons, to hear the stirring strains of the shofar, to dip apple into honey, to measure our actions and to begin anew. Rosh Hashanah brings us to the hopeful start of another year.

We then culminate 10 days of serious soul-searching with fasting and prayer. The significance of the day is acutely impressed into our "afflicted" souls by our hunger, our sense of vulnerability and by the aweful awareness that to a great extent our futures lie within our own hands. Yom Kippur brings us to a window through which we peer with trepidation.

On the 15th day, we celebrate. We "dwell" in flimsy booths. We take the four species into our hands. They are the visible symbols and the tangible proofs of a common past and a shared memory. We observe the holiday with joy. We sing and we dance. We find our happiness. Sukkot brings us to rejoicing, and to an understanding of the inter-connectedness of the individual to his or her people, the people to its traditions and those traditions to the future.

This is a precious and vital understanding. Its importance was underscored in the July issue of Commentary by Prof. Robert S. Wistrich.

"This is surely the greatest paradox of the postwar Diaspora," he wrote. "Never has it enjoyed such optimal conditions, and never has it seemed, in the longer term, more like an endangered species. Its continuity and distinctiveness as an ethnic group are seriously in doubt."

The Tishrei journey, therefore, has as its point of departure the very same three-pronged point of its arrival: belonging, participation and commitment.

Throughout the month we gather around our families. And if we truly understand the inter-connectedness of families, we will be able to see, reflected in the glow of our children's faces and in the sustaining memories of individuals we have loved but are no more, the outlines of a promise, a vow to search for and to discover within ourselves — as individuals and as a people — the eternal reservoir of high moral purpose and collective responsibility from which we always drank, were strengthened and found direction.

Letters to the Editor

Letters are welcome if they are brief, in English or French, typewritten with lines double spaced, and of interest to our reading public. Readers are cautioned not to make sweeping claims against persons or institutions which they cannot verify, as libel laws are very stringent. We reserve the right to edit and condense letters, which must bear the sender's address, phone number and both handwritten and typed signatures.

GEORGETOWN ORPHANS

I write you with a request for assistance in enriching a bit of Eastern European-American Jewish history.

I am at work on a manuscript on the eastern Polish town called Mezhirech or Mezrich by the Jews, and Miedzyrec Podlaski by the Poles in Lublin Province. The Encyclopaedia Judaica describes the tragic course of events in Mezrich which apparently is juden rein!

My interest in Mezrich and even more in the Mezritcher Aid Societies which once existed (some still do) in some Canadian and American cities is based on the fact that my paternal grandparents, Nachmun and Annie (Necchuh) Greenblatt, came to New York in 1900, worked for pennies, then were drawn to Detroit by Henry Ford's 1914 announcement of the $5 daily wage for employees.

My grandparents took the lead in forming a Mezritcher Aid Society. Societies around the country wrestled money from their landsmen to bring over 76 orphans from Mezrich in 1927. They brought them to a farm outside Georgetown, Ont., built a dormatory, hired a manager. They could not bring them into the U.S. because of the restrictive national origins quota system in the 1924 Immigration Act.

The saving of the orphans is the big story. The "back-to-the-land" idea essentially failed. By 1930 most orphans had left the farm, moved to Winnipeg, Toronto, Montreal and Quebec, entered the trades, especially the needle trades, or opened small businesses. Some moved to the United States.

With great and enduring pride, I want to tell their story and that of their children and grandchildren. I ask the benefactors (if any still be alive), the orphans or their children or grandchildren to contact me by letter or phone to tell their stories.

ON POLES AND HOLOCAUST

It is a pity that I did not quote more extensively from historian Yisrael Gutman in my letter about alleged Polish complicity in the Holocaust (CJN, Aug. 18). It may have prevented Sheldon Kirshner from going on to charge Poles with silence.

Gutman explains: "Poland was a completely occupied country. There was a difference in the kind of 'occupation' countries underwent in Europe. Each country experienced a different occupation and almost all had a certain amount of autonomy, limited and defined in various ways. This autonomy did not exist in Poland. No one asked the Poles how one should treat the Jews."

Indeed, why would anyone reasonably expect the Germans to care what Poles thought, let alone cater to them, when right from the outset they rounded up, interned and executed (Christian) Poles — including their political and church leadership — by the hundreds of thousands.

This was not Denmark where the Germans met with minimal resistance and later went for R & R, and executions were a rarity. Their goal was to destroy Polish nationhood and most Poles, like most Jews, were preoccupied with their own survival. Among the many victims were over 1,000 men, women and children specially put to death for aiding Jews — something unheard of elsewhere.

One should also remember that Jews did not always behave properly toward their Polish neighbors. Jan Karski, the famed courier recently made an honorary citizen of Israel, reported from Soviet-occupied Eastern Poland (from where over one million Poles were deported to the Gulag), in February 1940: "The Jews are entering the political cells. They have taken over the majority of political and administrative positions. . . But what is worse, Jews are denouncing Poles to the secret police and directing the work of the communist militia from behind the scenes. . . Unfortunately, one must say that those incidents are very frequent."

Jerzy Zralski
Secretary General
Canadian Polish Congress
Toronto

Sheldon Kirshner replies:

No one disputes the fact that some Poles aided Jews, a point I made in reply to Mr. Zralski's first letter. However, as historians have shown, many more Poles did not lift a finger to help Jewish Poles. They could have done so, but chose the path of indifference for the most part. True, Jews as individuals joined the communists, but in the hope, I suspect, of defeating Nazism and creating an egalitarian society free of anti-Semitism.

A DIFFERENT VIEW

Prof. Abe Shenitzer (CJN, August 18) was critical of columnist Sheldon Kirshner regarding the Polish-Jewish drama of World War II.

Unlike the Quisling government of Norway or the Ante Pavelic ultra-Catholic government of Croatia, the Nazis were never able to organize a pro-German Polish government, nor did any regular Polish troops fight on the side of Germany.

However, Prof. Adam Hempel of Warsaw University recently published a 450-page book, Gravediggers of Disaster. It describes the pre-war Polish State Police, which during the war came under German command and sometimes warned Poles, but never Jews, of an imminent arrest.

Also supporting Kirshner is the March 1993 article in Gazeta Wyborcza, Poland's largest daily, by senior editor Michal Cichy. Cichy deals with the so-called While Blots in the war history of Poland.

Cichy, a respected journalist who spent four years investigating Polish and German documents, put the spotlight on the NSZ national armed forces, one of about 20 underground movements during the Nazi occupation. NSZ still exists as a registered political party in the Polish parliament.

During the Warsaw Polish uprising of August 1944, some of the NSZ squads specialized in hunting down the 8,000 Jews who survived the Warsaw Ghetto, robbing and murdering these unfortunates. In the provinces, some NSZ units diligently searched and destroyed the Jewish partisan groups often with the tacit approval of German authorities.

It is hard for me, a Polish-born Canadian and a practising Catholic, to write about it. But one day we the Poles and the Jews must start some serious dialogue, and we must admit our guilt if we expect to be forgiven.

I invite Jerzy Zralski to attend in Poland the 50th anniversary of the Revolt of the Auschwitz Jews on Oct. 7, 1994. Such a dramatic act of solidarity with Jews in remembering the Jewish heroes will make more impact on Jewish communities in Canada than writing hundreds of letters to the editor.

Don't despair: there is also some good news to report

By RABBI W. GUNTHER PLAUT

Years ago, I followed the practice of many Canadians by turning on the CTV 11 p.m. news and afterwards going to bed.

However, I found this practice gave me a headache and interfered with my sleep. The news was simply too upsetting.

That led me analyze the general subject matter of newscasts. The answer was dismal: a significant percentage dealt with misfortunes, accidents, violence and like matters in all parts of the world. There was no relief, and good news was crowded out.

So I made the decision not to listen to the evening news at all, and I can report this little bit of private information: I fall asleep more quickly and I sleep better.

Of course that sounds like escapism. Shouldn't I know what is going on in the world, so I could gather my energies and try to do something about it?

But can't it wait till morning? Sure, comes daylight, I have the duty to know when misfortune befalls others, and I think the electronic media and the newspapers should report it. But the media should also record more upbeat, encouraging, hopeful and constructive events. Instead, we have to look far and wide to hear about such matters because they are not deemed of interest to the public. Well, I am part of the public, and they interest me.

So in order to contribute to the festive mood of the Holy Day season, here are two items:

For the last two years it has been painfully obvious that radical anti-Semitism has been flourishing in the black community of the United States. We were treated to a sample when mindless attacks were made on the Toronto Jewish community because of the production of Show Boat.

From time to time leaders in the black community have tried to stem this nefarious trend, only to be pushed to the sidelines.

Special marks therefore go to Hugh P. Price, who has been elected head of the Urban League in the States. At the annual convention of his organization he said:

Rabbi Plaut

"Many whites of good will have accompanied us on our long journey for racial, social and economic justice. None has matched the Jewish community as long-distance runners in the civil rights movement . . . We must not let ourselves, and especially our children, fall into the paranoid trap of thinking that racism accounts for all that plagues us."

He then added: "For all our sufffering, we cannot become so fixated on our own problems that we ignore our commonality of interest with others. All the problems I have addressed this evening — inadequate schooling, idle and alienated youngsters and chronic unemployment — cut across racial lines. If we are ever to deal with them on a scale remotely equal to their size, we must coalesce with people of other complexions who feel the same pain, even if it isn't as acute."

Because of negative developments, Jews have lately pulled back from their traditional stance of cooperation with the black community, but I think that at heart they are still ready for it, and given half a chance the old alliance can easily be re-established.

On an entirely different matter, it seems that East Asian students have replaced Jews in high school achievement. Chinese youngsters especially have garnered top honors in many provinces, and especially so in Ontario. Now I read that in an international mathematics contest held in Hong Kong, six students obtained perfect scores, and five of them came from the U.S. — all five were Jewish. And in Ontario, Grade 13 graduate Howard Feldman topped all students in the province with a near perfect report card.

Perhaps it is true that the great pressure which Jewish parents used to exert on their children has levelled off, and perhaps it is the East Asian parent who now put pressure on their youngsters. But the Jewish capacity to perform is still there, because for the last thousand years we have been a people devoted to intellectual pursuit. It showed up in the past, and I think it will still show up in the future.

The little-known Transnistria tragedy retold

By BARUCH COHEN

For Miriam Shvili, Transnistria Child Survivor

The more we know of the Holocaust, the more we change, the more we find ourselves circumscribed by the event we sought to transcend and from which we had hoped to pull free . . . The more we know, the more we shall remember.

— Terrence Des Pres

Massacre, deportation began after Romanian and German troops invaded Soviet Union

It is long overdue that the story of Romanian Jews in Bessarabia, Bukovina, Moldova, Dorohoi, Hertza, etc. should be told and placed within the framework of the destruction of European Jews.

I am therefore thankful to Felicia Carmelly for bringing to the fore the forgotten Holocaust of Romanian Jewry in her article, Transnistria — the Forgotten Cemetery (CJN June 21).

The history of the Holocaust in Transnistria incorporates the accounts of both the perpetrators and the victims. The Romanian army and police were among the leading perpetrators in Transnistria. Romania's national anti-Semitism reached unprecedented extremes during the years 1939-1944. Ion Autonescu, the Romanian "Fuhrer," believed that the dream of "Greater Romania," born in the summer of 1940, became a reality when the Romanian armies joined the German army in the Barbarossa campaign against Bolshevik Russia.

What happened in Romania reflects the main factors and issues of the Holocaust: Jews as a group were isolated and marked for death. Ghettos, forced labor camps, and death centres were established. The deportees from Bukovina, Bessarabia, Dorohoi, Hertza, Lipkani, were brought to Transnistria, stripped of their valuables, with no money, or means of livelihood, and completely disorganized.

According to the 1933 census, there were 207,000 Jews in Bessarabia, 107,000 in Bukovina and 119,000 in Moldova.

The massacre and deportation of the Jews started immediately after the advance of Romanian and German armies into Russia in the summer of 1941. Jews who survived the massacre of this campaign were interned in camps in Bessarabia and north Bukovina, and shortly after were deported to Transnistria.

The largest organized deportations to Transnistria started in October 1941 and lasted until January 1942. Most of the approximately 120,000 Jews from Bukovina, Bessarabia and Dorohoi were transported to an area in the city of Moghilev.

A second wave of deportation took place in the summer of 1942. The third phase in September 1942 included approximately 2,300, plus many from the central part of Romania (the old Regat).

The expelled Jews were unable to organize regular life. They needed hospitals and basic medical help, food, clothing, orphanages, etc.; instead, they were moved aimlessly from one ghetto to another, none of which had the medical facilities to accommodate them.

In the region of Moghilev, the Jews were divided into 53 ghettos and camps. Many deportees lived in pig barns, horse stalls, cow sheds.

When they finally found better dwellings, as many as 15 to 18 people had to share a room. There were not even the simplest sanitary facilities — no clean water, no detergents for basic disinfection. The death toll was extremely high, in particular in the winter of 1941-1942, when 30-50 per cent of the people perished in a typhus epidemic that raged throughout the ghettos and camps. Many people moved about naked, children were covered with rags or newspapers. Corpses lay in the fields, along routes of the marches, next to living people in the barns.

In comparison with the Transnistria death toll of 30-50 per cent during that first winter — in Warsaw, where hundreds of thousands of refugees were concentrated, the situation was horrifying, and when the ghetto was established it became worse. However, even under these shocking conditions, the death toll was 12-15 per cent.

The case of Transnistria illustrates the influence of the Nazis' "Final Solution" on the old, traditional anti-Semitism. Removing the Jews became central to the Romanian national anti-Semitic strategy.

The relatively high number of ultimate survivors (about 40 per cent) among Romanian Jews, despite the hard conditions, brutality, and inhuman behavior, is due to the lack of a systematic place of extermination, to political opportunism and to the ability to bribe the authorities (from the smallest civil servant to the highest authority).

In addition to the above, from the fall of 1943 the political situation changed in favor of the Western alliance and the Romanians became more reluctant to hand over Jews to the Germans for forced labor or for killing.

Prominent Jewish personalities in Romania — Dr. W. Filderman, Chief Rabbi Safran and other community leaders — were able to reach Queen Helen of Romania, arguing that the inhuman actions against the Jews contradicted the Christian and Romanian traditions.

Of the 400,000 Romanian Jews remaining after the war ended, over 90 per cent eventually reached the shores of Israel.

Today Romanian Jewry numbers 14,000-15,000 mostly elderly people.

Those interested in learning more about the Romanian Holocaust, with particular reference to Transnistria can read The Destruction of the European Jews by Raoul Hilberg (New York, 1992); Burning Ice — The Ghetto of Transnistria [in Hebrew] by Avigdor Shachan (Lohamei Hagetaot, Israel, 1988); or the article, The Holocaust in Transnistria by Dalia Ofer, in The Holocaust in the Soviet Union, edited by Lucjan Dobrosezycki and Jeffrey S. Gurock (Armonk, N.Y., 1993).

An exhibit titled, Splendor and Destruction: Jewish Life That Was, 1919-1945, depicts Jewish shtetl communal life in pre-war Lipkani, Romania. The show is currently on display at the Montreal Holocaust Memorial Centre.

Sukkot past stirs up some beautiful memories

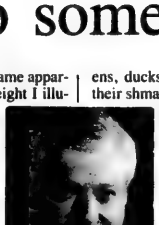
By JACK CHISVIN

The streetscape around me was a cyclorama of autumn hues. Brilliant colors were interlaced with dark shadows cast by the late afternoon sun. I was walking at a leisurely pace taking note of the many sukkahs being erected in the neighborhood.

A group of children, herded by a teacher barely more than a child herself, caught my attention. Animated laughter bounced between them in sharp counterpoint to my contemplative silence.

As I observed them, I wondered whether in their innocence, did they know the measure of years? Did they know how they were to live out their lives? Was their future already ordained by some superior power or would random chance select which of them would win and which of them would lose — which of them would taste success and which of them would never experience any joy? Which of them might become an achiever and which of them might never fulfil their promise?

My own particular genius first became apparent to the world when at the age of eight I illuminated a sukkah.



Jack Chisvin

In the early 1930's, in the first depression of this century, the north end of Winnipeg was a haven for immigrant families. They were strangers in a new land, decent, common folk, denied the opportunity of education, immersed in mysticism and superstitions brought with them from their shtetlach in Eastern Europe. Not sequestered behind locked doors in front of TV sets, much of their social action took place on the street, where commerce was conducted in Ukrainian, Polish, German, Yiddish and a polyglot of other tongues. Every child understood at least three languages and could curse in many more.

The community consisted of a grid of modest frame houses each with a shed at the rear of the yard. In summer the sheds sheltered a few chickens, ducks, turkeys and many geese raised for their shmaltz. As the days grew shorter and cold invaded the nights, the poultry were slaughtered and the sheds were used to store enough wood to fuel the stoves and furnaces during the long winter. The two wires strung between our house and the shed behind were said to contain electricity — a magic force — but since nothing was seen to be connected at the other end, they remained a mystery.

Immediately after Yom Kippur a sukkah was put up in the space between the house and the shed, directly under the wires. When it comes to the yomin tovim we all know the "time is out of joint" (Hamlet). They never occur on time, always either too early or too late. And when Sukkot comes too late in Winnipeg, a sukkah can be a cold and dark setting, a rendezvous for the ghosts who came out of the sheds at night.

One evening, in a year when Sukkot came very late, the neighbors gathered to investigate a strange light radiating from our sukkah. They stood in awe, admiring an illuminated light bulb which I had connected to the mysterious wires. "Who did it?" "Yankele, and he didn't electrocute himself — a za kopf!(such a head)." If my proud parents allowed themselves a foolish dream, surely their son would grow up to be an engineer. And so it came to be.

As Sukkot is the one pilgrimage festival without a megillah it is customary in some congregations to read the Book of Kohelet — Ecclesiastes — on the Sabbath of the intermediate days of the holiday. Whether we become what we are because it is ordained, or by chance, or it is simply beshert, what matters is as it is written in Kohelet "there is nothing better than that a man should rejoice in his own works."

On this laguid summer day, watching children be children, I enjoyed one of life's beautiful moments — a pleasant memory of a Sukkot past.

German camps now memorials

Sheldon Kirshner visits two former concentration camps in what was East Germany — Buchenwald and Sachsenhausen.

By SHELDON KIRSHNER

The contrast couldn't be sharper.

Beneath, in the lush Thuringian valley, lies the town of Weimar, the cultural capital of a Communist state which has vanished. Weimar was home to two of the greatest figures in German letters, Goethe and Schiller. Weimar was also where Germany's first democratic constitution was framed.

Ten kilometres away, atop a mountain thick with fragrant forests and wild flowers, is one of the most notorious concentration camps of the Nazi period, Buchenwald.

In no one single place in Germany is the dichotomy between the humanism and the brutality of the conflicted German soul so boldly visible.

Opened in July 1937, Buchenwald originally housed convicted criminals, homosexuals and political prisoners. Within about a year, following the mass arrests after Kristallnacht, more than 10,000 German and Austrian Jews were brought here. Then, during the war, Jews from Nazi-occupied countries, as well as Soviet and Canadian prisoners of war, arrived.

Avenue of Nations in Buchenwald. [Frank Schroder photo]

Prominent personalities passed through, or perished in, Buchenwald — Leon Blum, the former French prime minister; Ernst Thallmann, the head of the German Communist party; Fritz Thyssen, one of Germany's most important industrialists; and Rudolf Breitscheid, the ex-leader of the Social Democratic party in Germany.

Many Jewish children were murdered here, but some survived. Among them: Elie Wiesel, the novelist; Yisrael Meir Lau, the chief rabbi of Israel; and his brother, Naftali Lavi, Israel's one-time ambassador at the United Nations.

Although Buchenwald was not an extermination camp like Auschwitz, it claimed 56,000 lives, including at least 11,000 Jews. A crematorium disposed of the corpses.

Till the end, Buchenwald produced armaments for the German armed forces. Allied aircraft bombed its factories in August 1944, killing several hundred inmates.

And sadistic SS doctors conducted gruesome medical experiments here. After Buchenwald's liberation by Gen. George Patton's 3rd U.S. Army on April 11, 1945, soldiers found lamp shades made of human skin.

Today, Buchenwald consists of two parts — the memorial and the remains of the original camp.

The centrepiece in the memorial is a massive stone obelisk with a bell tower. It is set off by a stylized sculpture of 11 sombre figures. One grasps a flag. Three brandish rifles. One holds a cup.

Steps lead to the Avenue of Nations. A curved line of gray monoliths, honoring the victims of 18 countries, stand like stolid sentinels. The view of the idyllic plain below is stunning.

The camp houses former SS barracks, several Gestapo buildings, two watchtowers, a kitchen, a crematorium and a pathologie (where medical experiments were carried out and victims' gold teeth were extracted.).

The buildings are in poor condition and in urgent need of renovation. "They are decaying," Stein said.

The ovens of the crematorium, which look remarkably new, were built by Topf & Sons of Erfurt. They were installed in the early 1940s. Topf, which no longer exists as a company, supplied Auschwitz with similar state-of-the-art equipment.

As bizarre as it may sound, there was once a full-fledged zoo in Buchenwald, situated next to the crematorium. There were goldfish ponds, an aviary and a bear den. By all accounts, the animals were well fed and taken care of.

Although Buchenwald consumed more than 10,000 Jews, there was barely a mention of this tragedy before 1990, when the memorial was in East German territory.

The one and only exception was a simple plaque, nearly flush with the ground, which pays homage to the German and Austrian Jews rounded up in the wake of Kristallnacht.

As a Communist state, East Germany did not recognize Jews as a nationality, and thus Jews were classified as members of nationalities. As a result, nothing was said of the fact that about half of the estimated 8,000 Soviet soldiers who died here were actually Jewish.

In the late 1980s, the Jewish community in the state of Thuringia requested a specifically Jewish memorial, but the authorities did not respond, said Harry Stein, who's in charge of Buchenwald's history division.

After Germany's unification in 1990, Buchenwald survivors in Germany, Israel and elsewhere pressed Thuringia again. So last November, on the 55th anniversary of Kristallnacht, Buchenwald finally got a Jewish monument.

It is unprepossessing, taking the form of a long ditch buttressed by a concrete wall impregnated with olive wood. Around the ditch, filled with stones, are concrete letters in German, Hebrew and English which offer a message of hope and love taken from Psalm 83.

According to Stein, Buchenwald intends to rectify the mistakes of the past by placing appropriate emphasis on Buchenwald's Jewish dimension. A documentary film will drive home this point.

As well, homosexuals, gypsies and Christian opponents of Nazism will get their due through the medium of special exhibits.

And an exhibit on how East Germany viewed the Nazi era is planned.

Of Buchenwald's numerous visitors, a handful have been neo-Nazi rowdies. Two years ago, a group burst into the grounds, giving stiff-arm salutes and shouting anti-Semitic slogans. Last July, 22 neo-Nazis went on a rampage in the camp.

Stein is shocked by this kind of activity. "Nothing like this ever happened prior to 1990."

* * *

Sachsenhausen, which is 30 kilometres north of Berlin, close to the town of Oranienberg, has suffered far more neo-Nazi degradation.

In September 1992, shortly after a visit by Israeli Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin, fire seriously damaged a barrack which commemorates Jews killed in Sachsenhausen.

Two youths, believed to be neo-Nazis, were caught. In a trial, they were found not guilty, then freed. The barrack, which is currently covered by a plastic tarpaulin, will be rebuilt and reopened in 1996 as a museum dedicated to Jewish inmates, disclosed Gunter Morsch, the 41-year-old director of the Sachsenhausen memorial.

Sachsenhausen, opened in 1936, was a training centre for concentration camp personnel. Liberated by the Red Army, the camp claimed approximately 100,000 victims, including Allied and Soviet troops. It is still unclear how many of them were Jews. According to Morsch, Herschel Grynspan, the young Polish Jew who touched off Kristallnacht by assassinating a German diplomat in Paris, was incarcerated in Sachsenhausen.

As in Buchenwald, a surprising number of notables passed through Sachsenhausen — Kurt Schuschnigg, the former Austrian chancellor; Carl von Ossietzky, the 1935 Nobel Peace Prize winner; Martin Luther, the head of the German Foreign Office (who, ironically, participated in the 1942 Wannsee Conference which formalized the systematic extermination of European Jewry); and Martin Niemoller, the dissident theologian.

Like Buchenwald, Sachsenhausen produced weapons for the Wehrmacht, and submitted prisoners to agonizing medical experiments. What was unique about Sachsenhausen was its counterfeiting operation, which churned out British pound notes, passports, code books and stamps.

In the aftermath of the war, and right up to 1950, Sachsenhausen was a Soviet camp for political prisoners. Morsch says that 13,000 prisoners died of hunger, malnutrition and mistreatment.

In 1961, the camp was converted into a memorial with strong anti-fascist, Communist overtones. The martyrdom of Jews was ignored, as in Buchenwald.

The attitude of the authorities has undergone a remarkable transformation in the past four years.

Today, in the main exhibition building, there is an elaborate display devoted to Jewish history, broken down into such sub-themes as anti-Semitism, pogroms, the Dreyfus affair, Nazi Germany and anti-Zionism.

This is merely a temporary exhibit. A permanent one will replace it in 1998.

Only 10 per cent of the original camp — which sprawled over 380 hectares — escaped destruction by the Communist authorities between 1953-58, said Morsch, who has directed the affairs of the memorial since 1993.

Still standing are six guard towers, two Jewish barracks, a Gestapo cell block, a prison kitchen, a laundry, the pathologie, the commander's house and several industrial buildings.

At one point, Sachsenhausen boasted of three crematoria. But they are long gone, as are 54 of the 60 barracks, designated by stone markers.

In the camp kitchen, visitors can browse at an old photographic exhibition, while in the laundry, they can watch a documentary film. A new movie, minus the Communist rhetoric, is being readied for 1996.

The former clinic, a long green building with white trim, is in a sorry state of abandonment. Morsch — a historian with a PhD in Nazi theory — hopes to mount an exhibition on Nazism and racism in 1997.

An original East German photo exhibit of the camp in its horrible heyday is found in the white-tiled pathologie. Two tables, where experiments were conducted, remain. Directly beneath is a cellar where mountains of corpses were stored.

Several weeks before my arrival, workers uncovered a mass grave adjacent to the pathologie.

Under a master plan, the buildings in Sachsenhausen will be renovated, provided the necessary funds are available.

Morsch said he requires twice as much as the federal government and the state of Brandenburg have allotted. But since austerity is in the air these days, it's debatable whether Sachsenhausen's puny budget will be upgraded.

Mideast Analysis

By SHELDON KIRSHNER

The hard part is yet to come, but a year after the signing of the landmark Declaration of Principles (DoP) in Washington, Israel and the PLO are inexorably heading toward negotiations on the permanent status of the West Bank and the Gaza Strip.

If all goes according to schedule, the agreement — which is now taking root in the Gaza Strip and the West Bank town of Jericho in a trial experiment — will be fully implemented by 1999.

But major obstacles lie ahead — notably the question of final borders and security arrangements, the fate of the Jewish settlements and the perenially thorny issue of Jerusalem.

For good reason, both sides, once the most implacable of enemies, are leaving these complex matters for last and concentrating on fleshing out the least intricate provisions of the DoP, an historic document which emerged in the wake of secret talks in Norway.

After months of delays, caused in part by the Hebron massacre in February, the interim stage of the DoP was finally signed in Cairo on May 4. Not unexpectedly, there have been problems ever since, ranging from terrorism against Israelis and jurisdictional disputes over border crossings to the PLO's refusal to annul clauses in its covenant calling for Israel's destruction.

Nevertheless, there has been progress. On August 25, an early empowerment accord, granting the Palestinians control over education, health, welfare, taxes and tourism, went into effect. Modest though it may be, it is the first time in their history that the Palestinians have wielded such powers.

Problems beset accord

Once early empowerment is completed throughout the rest of the West Bank, the Israeli army — which is responsible for overall security in the territories — will redeploy outside populated areas. Elections will be held, and a Palestinian council will then begin administering the areas held by the PLO.

PLO chieftain Yasser Arafat, who moved from Tunis to Gaza on July 12, has his work cut out for him. Gaza, his base, is a disaster zone in terms of its infrastructure. Years of Egyptian and Israeli neglect have taken their toll. And the bulk of the $2 billion worth of aid that donor nations have pledged to help the Palestinians hasn't been released because the Palestinian Authority, the self-governing body, is still disorganized.

Arafat, whose challenge is to prove that he is a capable administrator, faces two major problems.

He must create credible accounting procedures so that foreign funds can start flowing into Gaza and Jericho. He must convince Israel that he is serious about combating terrorism, which has claimed the lives of 11 Israelis since May.

According to the Israeli army and the Shin Bet, Israel's internal security service, there has been a dramatic reduction in the number of terrorist incidents directed at Israelis in the past four months.

But each and every violent attack which kills or injures an Israeli is a blow against the peace process. Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin has admitted that terrorism cannot be eliminated. As he put it: "We knew it was impossible to erase 100 years of hatred with one signature." Yet Rabin has warned Arafat that terrorism — which is largely perpetrated by Islamic extremists opposed to an accommodation with Israel — may stop Palestinian autonomy in its tracks.

Arafat realizes that he is morally and contractually obliged to contain terrorism. On August 15, following the murder of an Israeli in Gaza, the Palestinian police force temporarily detained Muslim radicals. But it's highly doubtful whether Arafat, a builder of consensus, would be willing to challenge Hamas — the main Islamic fundamentalist group in the territories — and thus risk a civil war.

Hamas, whose goal is an Islamic state on the ashes of Israel, has a dedicated corps of followers. So if the PLO undertakes a genuine effort to stamp out terrorism, a task at which Israel essentially failed, bloodshed and chaos will surely ensue.

Israel desires stability in Gaza and Jericho. But peace and quiet may not be possible if the PLO seriously confronts the Islamic movement.

Bone marrow donations said halachic obligation

By LEILA SPEISMAN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Jews are obliged by Halachah to donate bone marrow if called upon to do so, according to a noted Torah scholar and bio-ethics expert.

Rabbi David Bleich, a rosh yeshivah at Yeshiva University's Rabbi Isaac Elchananan Theological Seminary (RIETS), and professor of law at the Benjamin Cardozo School of Law, spoke recently as part of the Perez and Frieda Friedberg Lecture Series, at Torath Emeth Synagogue.

This question was brought forcefully home to him, he said, when a man, found to be a match for a terminally ill patient, claimed to be too busy, but said he would give the marrow when his holidays came around. The patient he could have helped, died.

Pikuach nefesh, the obligation to save life, has two elements, Rabbi Bleich explained.

First, he said, there is the mitzvah of hashovas aveidim, returning lost objects.

"If one has the obligation to return something that is lost to its owner," Rabbi Bleich said, "how much more do we have an obligation to restore life?"

Furthermore, there is an injunction that we must not stand idly by when our neighbor's life is in danger.

Citing rabbinic sources, including the Radbaz (Rabbi David Ben Solomon ibn Abi Zimra) and Rabbi Joseph Caro, Rabbi Bleich said that since bone marrow, like blood, replenishes itself (unlike a kidney, for instance) and since the harvesting of the marrow does not constitute a danger to the donor's life or health, there is no halachic reason to avoid the obligation.

The only concern, he said, might be the danger posed by the general anesthetic used during the procedure, a danger which is also an issue during elective surgery done "for the sake of vanity."

There is no obligation, he said, to put your own life at risk in order to perform a mitzvah, even one as important as pikuach nefesh. However, said Rabbi Bleich, "I have checked the medical literature, and found that the risk of general anesthesia is one in 10,000, a statistic that includes the elderly and the sick.

"Since it is usually healthy, young adults who are tested, the risk to that segment of the population is even less."

Rabbi Bleich noted that "Halachah is concerned with perception, not statistics," and admitted that other rabbis might take a different view.

But "I believe that the risk is minimal. I believe the risk is obligatory to take."

A member of the audience asked whether it is obligatory according to Halachah to be tested as a potential donor, such as during the mass screenings for Jay Feinberg.

Rabbi Bleich replied that while it is "meritorious, advisable, a mitzvah," it is not obligatory.

"The obligation for pikuach nefesh only exists if there is a direct cause and effect. The chance of being a donor is so remote, that there is no [halachic] obligation."

The same ruling applies for giving money for testing. While it is not obligatory, it is, according to the rabbi, meritorious and a mitzvah.

The question arose (and Rabbi Bleich noted it has frequently arisen) as to whether one is obligated to donate bone marrow for a person different from the one the test was for, especially if that person is not Jewish.

Absolutely, the rabbi replied. "If we respond positively to such a request, Jewish lives will be saved [in the same way]. If non-Jews are also saved, there is nothing wrong with that."

Halachah is very different from Canadian and American common law, Rabbi Bleich said. Common law does not insist that someone come to another person's aid unless there is some definite contractual relationship, such as a doctor may have with his patient.

Jewish law says both that a person is obligated to help someone in danger, and that a patient has an obligation to seek treatment.

"This is not a contractual obligation; it's an obligation that everyone owes G-d. G-d created man, and commanded him to preserve his own life and the life of others."

Exodus program brings Jewish teenagers to Israel

JERUSALEM — More than 500 Jewish teenagers had the adventure of a lifetime this past summer, thanks to a unique project organized by the WZO Youth & Hechalutz Department and funded by the Jewish Agency.

Called Exodus, the program sought to re-create the journey of thousands of Jewish refugees who sailed to Israel during the 1930s and 1940s.

Known as Aliyah Bet, the "illegal" immigration to Palestine was fraught with difficulties and danger.

Though it would be impossible to re-create the refugee experience aboard a ship with a swimming pool and air-conditioning, the teens — who were on their way to Israel to take part in a variety of summer Israel Experience programs — quickly got into the spirit of the adventure.

The teens — aged 13 to 18 — (from eight different youth groups) boarded a ship, Exodus 94, in Brindisi, Italy. Once aboard, they took part in workshops related to Aliyah Bet and the plight of the refugees.

Directed by the staff, the kids tried to imagine themselves in the shoes of the refugees, who had lost virtually everything. Sitting in circles all around the ship, they wrestled with hypothetical dilemmas, such as whether they would stay in Europe after the Holocaust or risk their lives sailing to Palestine.

Other workshops dealt with the issue of inter-dating and inter-marriage where the kids discussed the difficulties of growing up in mixed communities, where Jews live among non-Jews.

When they weren't attending seminars, they had the opportunity to speak with several members of the original fleet of Aliyah Bet ships, including Ike Arrane, the captain of the Exodus '47.

Arrane patiently explained the elements of fiction in Leon Uris' novel, Exodus and that the refugees aboard the real Exodus '47 were sent back to Europe.

In lighter moments, the teens manned the ship's radio and gave updates on the whereabouts of the "British fleet," or designed posters with headlines from newspapers from the 1940s. That done, they sat by the pool and socialized.

About an hour out of Haifa Bay, the teens were assembled on the deck; they were amazed to see a small plane directly overhead. As the plane flew above, it dropped leaflets, saying: "We are the Authorities — Do not Endanger Yourselves Further Surrender Peacefully."

A few moments later, the "British" appeared again, this time in the guise of a navy boat (actually part of the Israeli Navy).

Throughout the fictional capture of their ship by the British, the teens waved flags and home-made banners, and danced Israeli dances around the deck.

Soon after arriving in Israel, the groups were bused to Atlit, the prison camp where many Jewish refugees were interned before the establishment of the State. There, the kids talked about their experience aboard the ship.

Virtually all said they'd had a great time, thanks in large part to the friendships they'd made during the three days at sea.

Hoshanas one of most beautiful holiday ceremonies

By FRED WEINBERG
Special to The CJN

One of the most beautiful ceremonies in the Jewish liturgy takes place on Sukkot.

It consists of processional circuits, called hoshanas, in which as many worshippers as possible, including children, walk around the synagogue holding in their hands the lulav and the etrog.

The circuit is made around the bimah and indeed around the entire circumference of the synagogue as a reminder of what took place in the Temple of Jerusalem when the lulav was carried around the Temple altar during the seven days of Sukkot.

The lulav is held with the spine facing the holder. (The etrog, and the two other plants that are inserted on each side of the lulav, the myrtle and the willow, complete the arba'ah minim, the four kinds of plant life that are symbolic of Sukkot.)

The march around the synagogue takes place towards the end of the service when a scroll is taken from the ark and stationed on the reader's desk, while the congregation carrying the arba'ah minim walk in procession around the bimah.

In the past few years there have been many archaeological discoveries in the Middle East. Most widely found are representations of the Temple and its contents. In ancient synagogue sites and in manuscript illustrations these symbols, which include the lulav and etrog, denote hope for national and religious regeneration.

The lulav and etrog are found in their finest symbolic form on the walls of the third century synagogue at Dura Europus in Syria, in the fifth century floor in Israel in the kibbutz of Beth Alpha and in many illuminated manuscripts of the Middle Ages.

One of the most complete and best preserved of such manuscripts is the Perpignan Bible, written in that city in southern France in the year 1299. There are many similar later bibles that followed this style in which the full range of temple instruments is spread out over two pages.

The menorah, that is the temple candelabrum, and the implements for its care are prominent on one page, but there is also depicted the lulav and etrog.

When Jewish coins were minted in the 300-year period from the revolt of the Maccabees to the rebellion of Bar Kochba in 135 CE, the Jewish symbols of the lulav and etrog appeared on those coins of bronze and silver.

The lulav is a palm tree branch. Of all the trees, the palm figures most prominently in Jewish folklore. The palm motif appeared on the walls, doors and the pillars of the tabernacle and the Temple. Indeed life and fertility were expressed by the symbolism of the pomegranate and the palm tree. The pomegranate, rich in seed, decorated the ceremonial gown of the High Priest and is still remembered today in the rimmonim (pomegranates) which adorn scrolls, "the tree of life for those who cling to it."

613 seeds

Indeed the staves on which the Torah parchment is rolled and on which the rimmonim rest, are called the atzei chayim, the trees of life. According to chassidic tradition, the pomegranate has 613 seeds equal in number to the 613 mitzvot, biblical commandments.

The palm tree was possibly important because its fruit was a major element in the Middle Eastern diet. This relationship of fruitfulness and the palm tree and water was emphasized in the Sukkot celebration in Temple days when the lulav and etrog were featured in the prayers for water.

So, harkening back to Temple days with hopes for redemption and restoration of Jewish worship and ceremonies in the future, the circuit with the etrog and lulav around synagogues today forms a beautiful party of the Sukkot liturgical worship and, especially for the children who participate, a wonderful memory.

Josette and Selim Sassoon at the Shaar Ha-Shamayim Synagogue in Cairo.

Egyptian Jew returns to land of Pharoahs

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — For 21 years, Selim Sassoon, an Egyptian Jew, worked as an executive accountant for the Shell Oil company in Cairo.

Then in 1956, with the Suez crisis looming, Sassoon became convinced there was no future for Jews in Egypt and took his family to Canada, part of a modern exodus that saw the end of the 80,000-strong Jewish community of Egypt.

But this summer, the 85-year-old grandfather, who now lives in Toronto, was carried back down unto Egypt like Jacob in his old age, seeing again the Sphinx and the Gizan pyramids under which his family used to picnic, and many other familiar sights.

"It was wonderful," he says of the four-week trip he took with daughter Josette Sassoon, 46. "I don't regret a moment of it."

The Sassoons had not been back to Cairo in 38 years. "Everything was changed completely," he said. The family used to take a half-hour streetcar ride to the once-outlying zoo. Now the zoo is in the midst of Cairo's buildings.

While the Sassoons' sojourn in Egypt was one of personal reminiscence, it also took in most of the sites relevant to the long history of the Jews in Cairo. Perhaps foremost among these is Ben Ezra Synagogue, the 11th-century edifice that is surrounded by some 29 mosques and 20 churches in an extremely old part of the city. Its genizah, a storage space behind a wall, was rediscovered in the last century, yielding Jewish manuscripts once thought lost. "Groping our way through bumpy, cobbled, narrow streets surrounded by stone constructions, I really felt that we were walking back in time and history," said Josette.

Another synagogue, Shaar Ha-Shamayim, was surrounded by security guards who at first barred the duo. They eventually got permission to enter the building where Selim married his late wife, Dora, more than 50 years ago, and where Josette's naming and her brother's circumcision took place.

Inside, they were astonished by the grandeur of the building, replete with stained glass windows and imported Italian marble floors, columns and stairways. "It still seemed as beautiful and majestic as I remembered it as a little girl," she said. However, Selim was shocked that a massive chandelier had been sold by the congregation to raise funds to maintain the synagogue.

"The ark is interesting, it's like a little room," said Josette. "It still has 32 Torahs inside. The Torahs came from Iraq a long, long time ago."

The Sassoons also visited their former home and the English immersion school where Josette and her brother once studied. As well, they took a cruise up the Nile to Luxor, where Selim pointed out the balcony of the hotel room where he and his wife had honeymooned.

"For my father, this was a trip down memory lane," Josette said. "I could have gone on a tour any time I wanted, but to have gone with my Dad was wonderful. I couldn't have found my house or any of the other things without him."

Selim, who was awarded a Governor General's award last year on the 125th anniversary of Canada for his community volunteerism, said his family is not related to the wealthy Sassoon dynasty of the 19th century, which has been called the Rothschilds of the East. "There are very many families with the name Sassoon," said Selim, whose parents came from the Sephardi communities of Iraq and Iran. "It's a very common name, like Smith. There are Sassoons in Hong Kong, China, and especially India."

Israel-Egypt medical project

PETAH TIKVAH, Israel — The Children's Medical Centre of Israel (CMCI), the only critical-care hospital for children in the Middle East, will be among the first Israeli institutions to take part in joint medical projects with Egypt.

A senior Egyptian delegation headed by Mahmoud Abd El Halim Elshahawi, deputy director of the Egyptian Foreign Ministry, was in Israel to sign a number of cooperative agreements in the fields of science, education, and medicine.

The accords marked the first such agreements between the two nations since 1980, according to Uri Bar-Ner, deputy director general for science, culture and academia of the Israeli Foreign Ministry.

He announced that CMCI would be part of this cooperative agreement. Physician exchanges between Egypt and Israel are expected to begin in the near future under the agreement.

While on their mission to Israel, the Egyptian officials visited the Centre of Hematology-Oncology at CMCI, where they saw two 8-year-old boys from the Gaza Strip who are receiving bone-marrow transplants.

Elshahawi said he and his colleagues were delighted to visit the advanced-treatment medical centre. They also met a physician from Gaza who is receiving special training in pediatric hematology-oncology.

Dr. Eliahu Wielunsky, deputy director of CMCI, said the hospital, which opened two years ago in Petah Tkivah, "is the realization of a dream of creating a bridge of peace between Israel and its neighbors."

New Na'amat Israel leader to visit Ottawa

OTTAWA — Etty Danzig, national president of Na'amat Canada, announced plans are being formulated to welcome Ofra Friedman, newly elected president of Na'amat Israel, at the national board meeting, to be held in Ottawa October 22-23, 1994.

The national board, representative body of Na'amat members across Canada, will discuss policy for the coming year.

They will hear directly from Friedman of current needs and the progress of Na'amat Canada's newest project in Israel, the building of a shelter and counselling centre for victims of family violence in Tel Aviv.

Friedman was elected president of the influential women's movement in Israel for the next four years at the 16th National Convention of Na'amat held in Tel Aviv July 18 and 19. She succeeds Masha Lubelsky, MK, deputy minister of trade & industry, who stepped down following her election to the Knesset.

A dynamic leader of Na'amat since 1982, Friedman has been chair of the Status of Women Department of Na'amat since 1990. Prior to that she was legal counsellor and director of Na'amat Legal Aid Bureaus.

Born in Tel Aviv, she graduated from the law school of Tel Aviv University in 1973 and served for a time as legal counsel at the Israeli Embassy in Paris.

High on her agenda is to get more women involved in standing up for their rights.

"As the largest women's movement in Israel, we have immense political and economic power," Friedman asserted. "Na'amat will concentrate its efforts on women's economic status in determining their position in the home, in the workplace, in politics and in promoting women to municipal boards, boards of directors of large public corporatioons and other power centres."

Ofra Friedman

Since 1921, Na'amat has championed women's rights and maintained its focus on greater equality for women.

With the support of Na'amat Canada and sister organizations in 14 countries worldwide, Na'amat Israel provides vital social services to women and their families by maintaining day care centres, day/night homes, vocational high schools, free legal aid services, centres for the prevention and treatment of domestic violence and family health centres.

In Canada, Na'amat promotes Jewish education and culture and participates actively in Canadian civic life.

Bar-Ilan offers pluralistic campus with religious tone

By FRANCES KRAFT
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Although Israel's Bar-Ilan University is often perceived as an "Orthodox university," over half the students are graduates of secular high schools, according to David Weinberg, spokesman and director of English communications for the university.

Nor are all members of the teaching staff Orthodox, said the former Torontonian in a recent interview at the CJN's Toronto office. In fact, there are even some non-Jewish students at the university.

Weinberg, 32, has been affiliated with Bar-Ilan since January, when he became coordinator for external affairs and academic editor at the university's Begin-Sadat (BESA) Centre for Strategic Studies. In June he took on a communications role in addition to his BESA Centre responsibilities. Prior to his aliyah in 1990, he was director of research and education for the Canada-Israel Committee.

"The Canadian connection at Bar-Ilan is really strong," noted Weinberg. The first parlor meeting to discuss supporting the university was held in Montreal 40 years ago, he said.

Bar-Ilan, which will celebrate its 40th anniversary next year, was established as a "bridge," Weinberg explained. "Its main emphasis is on being a moderating force in an increasingly polarized society."

It is the third-largest university in Israel, with regional colleges in Safed, the Jordan Valley, Ashkelon and Kedumim, as well as its main Ramat Gan campus.

What makes the university unique is its combination of secular and Judaic studies, the latter of which are compulsory. "Every student comes out with the equivalent of a minor in Jewish studies," Weinberg explained.

David Weinberg

Credit courses such as Jewish History, Jewish Philosophy, Bible and Jewish Literature comprise an important part of the Bar-Ilan curriculum.

The university also offers a broad range of secular studies, including Law, Social Work, Chemistry, Physics, Mathematics and Computer Sciences, Musicology and Librarianship.

Students include Russian and Ethiopian olim, senior citizens, overseas students and soldiers in the Israel Defence Force. The latter group finds Bar-Ilan attractive because of the university's large complement of evening classes and its regional colleges, which may be more accessible for them, explained Weinberg.

"The campus is very much a pluralistic place — with an additional religious flavor," Weinberg said.

'Michael is with a family at the moment'

There's a strong probability that Michael Benjamin is with a family when another one calls.

Families tell us again and again that our time spent meeting with them is more comforting than sympathy.

For instance, only at Benjamin's is there the opportunity of discussion with a licensed funeral director who is Jewish.

There is a depth of Jewish knowledge to draw upon, and the assurance of personal supervision that leaves no doubt about strict religious observance.

They receive sensitive advice respecting unique family circumstances when they ask about alternatives and express their preferences. They know with confidence that Kovod and dignity will always prevail.

Families recognize that more than a license is needed when there is just one chance to honour the memory of a loved one without incident and according to Jewish custom. For them, the difference at Benjamin's is worth everything.

McGill study makes 'cautiously optimistic' forecast

By JANICE ARNOLD
CJN Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — A "cautiously optimistic" forecast that Montreal Jewry can maintain a population of around 100,000 is presented in a McGill University study based on the 1991 Canadian census.

The main reasons for this are slowed out-migration, immigration, former Montrealers returning, a minor baby boom and a low intermarriage rate, said James Torczyner, co-author with Shari Brotman, of Diversity and Continuity: The Demographic Challenges Facing Montreal Jewry.

The 231-page paper provides amplification and further analysis of the preliminary study of the community released last November during the Council of Jewish Federations (CJF) General Assembly (GA).

"From a demographic standpoint, Montreal Jewry has weathered the most dramatic losses of its population," the study concludes. What the past can't tell, of course, is what effect Quebec's political future may have on the community.

As was made known last November at the GA, the authors identified 101,210 Jews in Montreal in 1991 based on a definition of Jewish by religion and/or ethnicity, but excluding ethnic Jews with a religion other than Judaism.

That represents a loss of 2.1 per cent from 1981 and 8 per cent from 1971 when the community reached a recorded peak of 109,485. Relatively, though, Montreal has slipped much more; the community is now the ninth biggest in North America, where in 1971 it was sixth.

It's loss of numbers may be less than expected, but in contrast to the growth of the Canadian Jewish population in general (14 per cent) and Toronto in particular (26 per cent) from 1981-91, Montreal is simply holding steady.

The authors found that almost 4,500 Jews moved to Montreal between 1986-91, 85 per cent of whom were immigrants, most of them born in Morocco or Israel. (The census does not reveal last country of residence). In the same period, about 3,100 Jews left Montreal for other parts of Canada.

Between 1971-91, 13,905 Jewish immigrants came to Montreal, including 6,355 from 1981 to 1991.

Montreal Jews are also having more children. The percentage of Jewish children under age 14 rose to 19 per cent, and almost 20 per cent of families had three or more kids.

The 25-34 age group diminished the most over the decade and the over 75s increased, but the 50-74 bracket was down, indicating to the authors that the aging of the community may be levelling off. It's still a comparatively elderly community with 22 per cent over age 65.

Although the percentage increased slightly from 1981, Montreal Jews still have the lowest intermarriage rate in North America. Just under seven per cent of all Montreal Jews (of all ages) live in intermarried families.

The number of Sephardim is estimated at between 14,500 and 20,500 depending on how much weight you give various determinants. The census, of course, does not ask this information, so Torczyner and Brotman have used the variables of language, country of birth and year of immigration, at the same time, recognizing that all Sephardim are not French-speaking and that country of birth is not always a reliable indicator.

Thus the lower figure puts more emphasis on place of birth, such as North Africa, and the higher stresses language — French, Spanish or Arabic.

French is the mother tongue of 16 per cent of Montreal Jews, making Montreal the city with the largest number of francophone Jews outside France or Israel. Almost 10 per cent of Montreal Jews were born in North Africa or other French-speaking countries.

Over 60 per cent of Montreal Jews claim to speak English and French, up from 50 per cent bilingual rate of 1981.

Only 63 per cent of Montreal Jews are Canadian-born, and English was the main language of the home for 56 per cent.

While past studies by Torczyner have focussed on surprisingly high levels of poverty among Montreal Jews, this paper shows that the community generally has a higher income than the Montreal and Canadian averages, but Montreal Jews are not as well off as Canadian Jews as a whole.

Although three times as many Jews earned over $75,000 in 1991 than did the general Montreal population (7.9 per cent vs. 2.2 per cent), almost 60 per cent of Jews over age 15 earned less than $25,000. Twenty percent of all Jews were below or marginal to the poverty line, while in Montreal generally the rate was 25 per cent.

A large proportion of the Jewish poor were elderly women.

The lowest earners were in the 15-34 years and 65-plus categories, which can be explained by the fact that many of these people either have not entered or have retired from the workforce.

The wealthiest were those in the 35-64 age range, with 30 per cent making more than $50,000 that year.

The prosperity of Montreal Jews can be attributed in large part to their high level of education, the study says. More than 40 per cent were either enrolled in university or had completed at least a bachelor's degree. These rates are twice that of Canadians and Montrealers generally.

Three times as many Montreal Jews (12 per cent) had obtained at least a master's degree compared to the Canadian average.

Montreal Jews are over-represented in many professions. They are 3.6 per cent of the city's total population, but 10 per cent of doctors and dentists and over five per cent of lawyers, accountants and notaries are Jewish.

The study was conducted by the McGill Consortium for Ethnicity & Strategic Social Planning, in conjunction with CJF Canada, Federation CJA and Statistics Canada.

Torczyner and Brotman say the Montreal Jewish community has remained highly cohesive despite the changes and "angst" it has gone through in the last 20 years. But the data, which describe a very diverse Jewish population culturally and economically, should pose serious questions for community decision-makers concerned with serving its needs and making all Jews feel a part of the community, Torczyner said.

The study was released with much fanfare at McGill in the presence of representatives of various Quebec ministries and Jewish communal agencies, and included the participation of new McGill principal Bernard Shapiro and Harvey Wolfe, vice-president of CJF Canada.

Funding essential for 'quality' of life

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Spending more money on health care does not affect longevity but it can improve quality of life, says a prominent cardiologist.

Dr. Eric Cohen, a specialist in angioplasty at Sunnybrook Health Centre, was the guest speaker at a meeting of the New Fraternal Jewish Association. About 100 people attended his lecture on the modern treatment of heart disease.

Although considerably more money is spent on medical care in the United States than in Canada, Americans don't live any longer, Cohen said. But he stressed that easy access to hi-tech medical treatment enables the majority of Americans with heart disease to live with less discomfort and disability than their Canadian counterparts.

"Americans get diagnosed and treated quickly so they can get on with their lives," he said. "We make people wait. Canadians put up with more symptoms — chronic pain, shortness of breath and limited ability to exercise."

These symptoms can interfere with work and with leisure activities, but Cohen said that Canadians in life threatening situations get immediate treatment.

"[We] may not be doing as well as we think we are," but there's no easy solution because governments can't afford to put more money into health care, he said. He does not advocate the American health system for Canada.

"Americans are paying a price in terms of other aspects of their quality of life with their social and economic problems," he said. American medicine is also too competitive and commercialized, he said. "American hospitals compete to have patients. Canadian hospitals compete not to have patients."

Cohen said the business aspect of medicine — pharmaceutical companies and the manufactures of hi-tech medical equipment — affects treatment on both sides of the border. Medical treatment is based on economics as much as it is based on science, he said.

For example, higher blood cholesterol levels are no longer considered acceptable, thanks to influence from pharmaceutical companies as well as medical research, Cohen said.

Cohen's lecture covered the physiology of the heart, risks factors for heart disease, the various types of heart disease, diagnostic methods and the various treatment techniques. The audience asked many questions pertaining to by-pass operations and angioplasty.

Kehillat Shaarei Torah welcomes new rabbi

By LEILA SPEISMAN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The move from sunny Alabama to Toronto is not as traumatic as it might have been for Rabbi Reuven Tradburks, new spiritual leader of Kehillat Shaarei Torah Synagogue.

After all, the 36-year-old rabbi notes, he was born and educated in Ottawa.

He took up his new position in July, replacing Rabbi Steven Cohen, who has made aliyah.

Rabbi Tradburks earned his BA in philosophy at Carleton University, "with a religion major thrown in."

After studying at Yeshivat Ohr Somayach in Jerusalem, and at Ner Israel Rabbinical College in Baltimore, he moved to New York, where he received smichah (rabbinic ordination) at Yeshiva University.

Staying on for the advanced Yadin Yadin program, he taught at the university's special program for youngsters entering with no yeshivah background.

His first position was as assistant rabbi at Young Israel of Staten Island. In 1987, he assumed the position of spiritual leader of Knesseth Israel Congregation in Birmingham, Alabama.

He became very active in the community, becoming involved with kashruth supervision, community organizations like Federation and Israel Bonds, and the Jewish community centre.

Many of these responsibilities fell to him, he said, because the rabbis of the Reform and Conservative synagogues had much larger congregations to occupy themselves with.

As in any small Jewish community, "there were such thin resources that any Jewish content had to be self-started."

He organized, for instance, a Friday Judaic program at the Jewish community centre pre-school, and was actively involved in adding Jewish programming to their camp.

Rabbi Reuven Tradburks

The Birmingham community, he mused, is "successful, wealthy and highly respected. They are very involved in the civic world."

He noted that relations between the Jewish and Christian communities were very good.

"It's interesting. There are many Southern Baptists and Fundamentalist Christians there who are strong supporters of Israel and have a great fascination with Jews and Israel."

He would frequently give presentations and classes about Judaism. "They wanted to understand what their Messiah's life was like," he said.

Although he was happy in Birmingham, ("I went there with an enormous pioneering spirit, and I got to do lots of interesting things.") he was equally happy to come to Toronto.

"Toronto is the best Jewish city outside Israel in terms of education," he said, speaking not only of his children (he and his wife Joyce, a kindergarten teacher, have four children, Dvorah, age 10; Yosef, 8; Eli, 6 and David, 3) but of "my own personal growth [which] wasn't getting the attention it ought to."

For an outsider coming in, Rabbi Tradburks said, Toronto is a strong community.

"Toronto doesn't have to deal with many of the negative pressures of a free society, which lead to tremendous intermarriage, assimilation, and a sense of having to justify being Jewish. In the United States, many have lost the intuitive sense of why it is important to be Jewish."

Kehillat Shaarei Torah is an active centre of Jewish life, he said, with many young families and lots of bar mitzvahs.

"The shul is a tremendous success story. It has grown from a small group to an active and strong institution."

The best thing about it, he said, is that in spite of its increasing size (it now has 175 families), it is "still heimish and friendly. It is still possible for everyone to know everyone else."

Rabbi Tradburks is enthusiastically making plans. He wants to develop youth programs, encourage NCSY (National Conference of Synagogue Youth, the Orthodox synagogue youth program) and Free Torah High, as well as developing pre and post bar/bat mitzvah activities.

"Shaarei Shomayim has invited us to participate in their year-long bar mitzvah program," he said.

He is planning a "Turn Friday Night into Shabbat" and holiday related family programs, so that members will feel encouraged to come to the synagogue as a family unit.

Add to these ideas a chavurah program, where groups will meet in each other's homes and, for instance, discuss Jewish approaches to current events, and the rabbi hopes to have something to appeal to every age group.

A lot of people, he said, want to feel a part of an Orthodox shul. But because they themselves are not completely observant, "they may not feel comfortable in a shul with predominately shomrei shabbos people. They have a right to feel welcome."

He has been asked to join the Vaad Harabonim, and hopes in time to become active in community groups, such as Federation and the Jewish Community Centre.

He is particularly interested in education and outreach.

Jews have to ask themselves difficult questions if they want to ensure that the North American community will thrive, he believes.

Kehilla program seeking input on low-cost home ownership

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — A non-profit organization is looking for input from Toronto's Jewish community about low-cost home ownership.

"We'd like to survey their needs — find out what they can afford to pay, and what kind of housing they're looking for," said Stephanie Olin-Chapman, executive director of the Kehilla Residential Program.

Founded as a subcommittee of the Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto in 1982, Kehilla has developed three projects to date: Project MARC at 6091 Bathurst St.; the Avenel at 262 Ridley Blvd.; and Elm Ridge Residence, a seniors building now managed by the Baycrest Hospital.

Kehilla is concentrating on the Bathurst Street corridor from St. Clair Avenue into Thornhill. "We're asking people in our surveys, 'Where do you want to live?' and so far no one has said Scarborough," said Olin-Chapman.

The registered charity is also involved in a housing initiative called HaBayit Shelanu, a 59-unit supported seniors building presently under construction on Kendall Avenue, near Casa Loma. "We've also done research in support of basement apartments," Olin-Chapman said.

Kehilla's activities are overseen by a 24-person, volunteer board of director The organization "works to ensure that all members of the [Jewish] communi., are safely and adequately housed," according to its mission statement.

Olin-Chapman said she wants to hear from people interested in affordable home ownership. She said instead of paying a lot in rent, they could use the money to support a mortgage.

If you are interested in affordable home ownership within reach of synagogues, Jewish shops and schools, contact Kehilla at (416) 932-1212. The organization is located at 262 Ridley Blvd., North York, Ont., M5M 4N6.

About People

YIDDISH CULTURE GRANTS

The Montreal-based Foundation for Yiddish Culture in honor of Jacob Zipper and Shloime Wiseman awarded a 1994 grant to Sheva Zucker, a native of Winnipeg, for her work to prepare an anthology of Yiddish female prose writers in English translation. Her co-editors are Montreal University lecturer and poet Linda Lipsky and Vancouver poet and translator Prof. Seymour Levitan.

Grants were also awarded to two staff members of the Yiddish Program at Oxford University, England, Genadi Estraich, formerly of the Soviet Union, and Chava Beer, a native of Australia, and to a number of Israeli high schools to support Yiddish classes.

JEA CANADA REGION OFFICERS

The Jewish Educators Assembly, Canada region, has announced its executive for the 1994/95 school year. Incoming president is Joan Schoenfeld, principal of the Downtown Jewish Community School of Toronto. Secretary is Laura Wiseman acting principal of the Richmond Hill campus, United Synagogue Day School. Treasurer is Larry Katz, educational director of Beth Jacob Congregational School in Hamilton. Outgoing president is Pnina Zilberman, director of the Holocaust Remembrance Centre, Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto.

Joan Schoenfeld

The Jewish Educators Assembly is an educational professional organization which works in cooperation with the United Synagogue of Conservative Judaism and the Jewish Theological Seminary.

GOODMAN JUDAICA COLLECTION

Sheila and Robert Rothman (centre) join their daughters and sons-in-law, Lorne and Mimi Anisman (left), Shawna Rothman and Richard Cornblum (right), at the recent opening of an exhibit showcasing the extensive Judaica collection from the estate of the late Max and Evelyn Goodman, Mrs. Rothman's parents. The exhibit, on display until the fall at the Kanner Heritage Museum of Baycrest Centre, features Jewish artifacts, collectibles and ephemera, including samples from their Jewish postcard collection.

FINE FEATHERED FRIENDS VISIT BAYCREST

Five-month old macaws Oliver and Kirby kept resident Harold Pollack (right) and teen volunteer Emily Smyth enthralled at Baycrest Centre recently. The visit was part of an outdoor program for Baycrest clients which this year featured pet visiting. Among its many benefits, pet visiting enables clients to re-experience the joy of holding an animal and stimulates activity in people who may be withdrawn due to cognitive impairment or communication disabilities. The macaws were chosen for their bright colors and soft feathers, which increase sensory stimulation and for their affectionate natures. They were provided by PJ's Supercentre in Yorkdale and were accompanied by trainer Richard Bod (left) who raised the birds from birth.

Maccabi slow pitch team captures bronze

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Okay, so the guys on the team considered it "wimp ball" and some didn't even think it was worth playing. But in the end, Toronto's junior Maccabi slooooow pitch team came away with a bronze medal.

Not bad when you consider that most team members play either baseball (hardball) or fastpitch and were at a disadvantage trying to figure out how to hit the slow, arcing pitches.

Team coach Bob Cohen, a major league baseball scout, said the team's accomplishment was even more remarkable considering the relatively small population pool from which he drew. Most of the 13-man team come from Thornhill and they found themselves competing against units from Chicago and Los Angeles.

Nevertheless, they came within a hair of making it to the gold medal game, losing a 7-6 heartbreaker to Montreal, which advanced to the final.

Going into the bottom of the seventh and last inning in the game against Montreal, Toronto had just knotted the match at 6-6. But a fielding error allowed Montreal to score the winning run and advance to the title game against Los Angeles.

Ironically, Montreal lost that game by an identical 7-6 score — on a seventh inning, run-scoring error no less, Cohen said.

Toronto's last game against Chicago was a 14-12 slugfest. "You don't have pitchers' duels," Cohen said. Despite that victory, the team was disappointed. It was the first time Toronto didn't make it to the gold medal game since the Jewish Community Centre North American Maccabi Youth Games were inaugurated in 1986, Cohen said. Toronto won gold in 1986, '88 and '90, silver in '92 and bronze this time around.

Cohen believes the Blue Jays' success has something to do with the downward trend. The Jays' popularity has made hardball more popular, with the result that fewer kids are playing fastpitch.

This year was even more difficult for Toronto because the host, Cleveland, did not have a fastpitch team, so they switched the competiton to slowpitch, he said.

Some cities withdrew from the event as a result of that decision and organizers are now considering whether to go back to fastpitch or even hardball.

The slowpitch format put Toronto at a disadvantage because it took the boys several games to figure out how to hit the high, looping throws. If you swing at short pitches, you tend to reach and pop them up, while if you connect on long pitches, you tend to chop and hit groundballs, Cohen said.

In addition, the team had three 8 a.m. games (which they lost) that followed late night social events organized by the Maccabi hosts, he said.

Cohen credited the team of 15-16-year-olds (one was 14) with a great effort under trying circumstances. The team included: Ronnie David, Ryan Ficher, Randy Hoffman, Paul Coles, Eric Bernofsky, Erik Grosman, Mike Smulevitch, Benji Beder, Corey Birnbaum, Adam Dvorchik, Efram Kazman, Ryan Klein and Adam Wall.

David Finkler, who played on the senior Maccabiah Games in Israel in 1985, '88 and '93, and Michael Grosman were also coaches.

The boys' softball bronze was one of eight medals the 67-athlete Toronto team managed to bring home, said Harold Cipin, vice-president of Maccabi Canada. The Toronto contingent, led by Jim Emery, with Joe Moniz and Leanne Wasdell serving as co-captains, included participants in girls' softball, boys and girls' basketball, tennis, track and swimming.

Both boys' basketball teams (divided by age) finished with 2-2 records and did not vie for a medal, Cipin said.

The girls' basketball team of 13-16-year-olds racked up a 1-3 record and likewise did not compete for a medal.

The girls' softball team was 2-2 and finished out of the medal hunt.

In tennis, Josh Borenstein, ranked seventh in Ontario among 16-year-olds, lost in the quarterfinals. Borenstein is a member of the JCC's Northeast Valley branch, Cipin said.

In swimming, Jackie Strahl captured the silver medal in backstroke while in track, Jonathan Cohen of London won five medals, including three golds.

Cohen was first in the 110-metre hurdles, the 200-metre dash and the 100-metre dash.

He won silver in the 300-metre hurdles and silver again in the 4 by 100-metre relay. Cohen teamed up with Harley Gold for the relay silver. Organizers teamed them up with other athletes to round out the relay event.

The Toronto haul of eight medals was down from 27 at the last junior games, but that is attributable to a smaller team and stiffer competition, particularly in the swimming pool, Cipin said.

At the last games, Toronto fielded about 100 athletes, but they were asked to reduce that number to allow more JCCs from across the continent to participate, he said. Altogether 63 JCCs and five foreign delegations — 2,500 athletes — took part. Toronto relinquished 10 spots to allow Ottawa to field a larger team, Cipin added.

With the growth in popularity of the games, organizers have decided to split the contests in 1996 between New Jersey and St. Louis. Four thousand kids from 70 JCCs are expected to participate in those continental competitions.

Meanwhile, Hamilton athletes took home their share of medals as well. Tennis player Yan Gernburd struck for gold twice, in the boys (15-16 years old) doubles and mixed doubles events.

Clifford Ritter picked up a silver in mixed doubles and a bronze in doubles, while on the track David Nagler earned a silver medal as a member of the Canadian team in the 4 x 100-metre relay.

Victoria's Empress Hotel set to launch kosher kitchen

By MAURICE LUCOW
CJN Western Correspondent

VICTORIA — The Empress, Victoria's largest and most prestigious hotel, will launch its kosher kitchen (CJN May 26) on Oct. 2 with a fundraiser for Congregation Emanu-El.

The shul plans to build an addition onto its present heritage building (130 years old) and hopes to raise $1 million for the project.

Dr. David Brook, president of the shul, told The CJN architects are now being interviewed by a building committee and specific plans for the addition are still indefinite. It is expected, however, that it will include classrooms for the Hebrew school, an expanded kitchen, offices and a community meeting place.

At present, most activities take place in the sanctuary, and the school area is running out of space for the rapidly-increasing numbers of pre-bar/bat mitzvah students. The kitchen is too small to handle a large crowd and there is little space for a major community event.

The Empress will be the only place in the city where a large, strictly kosher affair can be held under supervision of a mashgiach. The Jewish Community Centre offers kosher food but the kitchen is not supervised.

The hotel's food and beverage director, Marc Saunier, said he has been negotiating with Vancouver kashruth authorities for several months and a number of menus have been approved.

An unused kitchen in the hotel has been koshered and new dishes and utensils have been purchased. A mashgiach will be brought in from Vancouver for special events, which will be able to accommodate up to 300 people.

Saunder said he has worked in kosher hotel kitchens in Montreal and New York. He also handled a luncheon for Queen Elizabeth who was here to open the recent Commonwealth Games.

The only other hotels in British Columbia offering kosher facilities are in Vancouver.

An after-dinner concert will feature the Lafayette quartet, soprano Lauren Wagner and guitarist Harold Micay.

Tickets are $100 per person, with a tax receipt available for a portion of that amount. For more information and reservations, phone or fax Stephanie Gilbert at (604) 477-5244.

Sondheim musical a macabre romance

By GERRY MORRIS
Special to The CJN

NEW YORK — Stephen Sondheim's latest musical, Tony Award winner for best Broadway musical this season, is a haunting tale of macabre Italian romance.

Set in northern Italy in 1863, it is a strange love story, but Sondheim, never daunted by offbeat themes (Assassins, Pacific Overtures), has plunged into a bold venture with perverse brilliance.

Based on Ettore Scala's brooding neo-romantic 1981 movie, Passione d'Amore, it is a rhapsodic tale of passion and obsession, so forceful that it creates a love where no love existed.

The story follows the lives of three characters. Giorgio, a handsome young military officer, has just been transferred to a bleak provincial outpost, far from Milan, the scene of his rapturous affair with Clara, a beautiful married woman. At the remote garrison he meets the bookish Fosca, a sickly, homely woman who becomes insanely obsessed with him, following their introduction by her brother, the Colonel in charge.

She discovers in Giorgio a sensitive man who shares her love of books and all things esthetic. The attraction becomes so consuming and out of control that it imperils the emotional stability of all parties (a more appropriate title might have been Frenzied Obsession).

The bizarre triangle leads to tragedy, but not before Giorgio recognizes that love can be defined by more than physical beauty, something he painfully learns as he experiences two very different forms of love.

Jewish composer-lyricist Stephen Sondheim is considered the American theatre's most provocative, intellectual talent. In Passion he has created a musical pulse that is lush and romantic, and has an emotional depth, which reaches beyond the boundaries of Broadway show music.

Sondheim has finally created a serious Broadway opera: a wonderful, mesmerizing two-hour intermissionless production, written with director-book writer James Lapine (Sunday In The Park With George and Into The Woods). The impact is heightened by Jonathan Tunick's woodwind rich orchestrations. The theatrical experience will live in my memory for years to come.

It becomes increasingly apparent to many devotees of the musical theatre that Sondheim is now reaching out to be the American version of Verdi or Puccini, and has no longer any interest in writing conventional Broadway tunes. With talent like his, who can blame him?

Appearing for an indefinite run at Broadway Theatre, 53rd & Broadway.

For tickets call Telecharge 212-239-6200.

Keri Wetstein

Beauty contest winner got involved on a dare

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Keri Wetstein, the winner of the recent Miss Pre-Teen Toronto pageant, never had any aspirations to be in a beauty pageant.

"It started off as a dare from my sister," the 13-year-old student told The CJN.

Her sister Lindsay, 14, said she had noticed a tiny ad about the pageant last year and she talked Wetstein into participating. Wetstein was third runner-up in the pre-teen category and she was voted Miss Congeniality.

But this year she came first out of more than 35 competitors for the Miss Pre-Teen Toronto title.

As the overall winner Wetstein will be getting an all-expense-paid trip to the Disney World Hilton in Orlando, Fla., this January, where she'll be representing Toronto in the 1995 Miss Pre-Teen Cities of America Pageant (the nationals).

Wetstein said she was very excited about winning. All the finalists hugged her just like in the pageants on television, but there were no tears, she said. "I don't cry when I'm happy."

But they were crying in her cheering section. Nine family members and friends came out to support Wetstein in the pageant held at Ryerson Theatre.

"When she won we all had tears in our eyes," Lindsay said. "We were jumping up and down and hugging each other."

Along with the Orlando trip Wetstein also won a watch and a modelling scholarship. From a physical stand point she fits the model stereotype: she's a natural beauty, she's a size one and she's five foot five and still growing. But Wetstein does not hope to be a professional model; she's planning a career in science, she said. "I have my heart set on being a research scientist."

Wetstein is an unlikely candidate for modelling, said her mother, Esther Gangel. "She's not beauty-conscious. She doesn't patshke with herself in the mirror."

Her sister agrees. "It's not her. She's into school work." (Wetstein is a straight-A student at Roselawn Public School).

Wetstein attended the nationals last January. Anyone placing 10th runner-up or better is allowed to compete. Gangel went along to chaperon. She said the focus of the competition is not limited to physical appearance; the contestants are also judged on personality and poise and their ability to communicate.

Last January, 500 girls from cities across the United States and Canada competed for the four titles: Miss Junior Pre-Teen — for ages seven to nine; Miss Pre-Teen — for ages 10 to 12; Miss Junior Teen — for ages 13 to 15; and Miss Teen — for ages 16 to 19. (Wetstein was in the pre-teen category this year because she turned 13 after the pageant.)

Wetstein said in spite of the competitive atmosphere she really enjoyed herself at the nationals. And she's planning to have a great time again in January, especially since her sisters, Lindsay and Andrea, 12, will be there too, she said.

"At the end of the pageant you saw that these girls had the time of their life," Gangel said. For Wetstein, however, the high point of the nationals had nothing to do with the pageant.

"The best time for me was spending time with my mom at Universal Studios," she said.

Wetstein won't be competing in the Toronto pageant next summer, but she'll be very much involved: she'll be passing on her crown to the next Miss Pre-Teen Toronto. She's not sure about her future in pageants, she said. "I had so much fun I don't know whether I want to keep going with it or stop."

Legal competition launched

TORONTO — Law students and young lawyers are being invited to submit their work in a competition sponsored by the Jewish Civil Rights Educational Foundation of Canada.

A $1,000 prize in honor of the late Arthur Maloney, Q.C., will be awarded for the work which best relates legal issues to the human rights and religious freedom issues affecting world Jewry.

Work must be less than 5,000 words and include a table of contents, footnotes and a bibliography. The year-long entry period begins Nov. 1.

The foundation was established in 1979 and now has close to 700 lawyers and judges as members.

Entries should be sent to foundation president Bert Raphael, c/o 181 University Ave., Suite 1812, Toronto, Ont., M5H 3M7.

Variety of workshops set for Yiddish conference

By BEN ROSE
CJN Staff Reporter

Nathan Garnick

TORONTO — If anyone has a collection of juicy, mouth-watering Yiddishisms, it is Nathan Garnick, who is lending his talents to a meeting in Toronto Oct. 7-10 which will bring together Yiddishists from all over the United States and Canada.

Garnick is leading two of the 12 workshops at the Second International Conference of Yiddish Clubs, one on The Art of Bilingual Storytelling and one on Creating Yiddish Theatre.

No doubt those coming to the conference will want to match Garnick in his ability to find the right Yiddish word for an English expression, but few will outdo him in sheer enthusiasm.

For instance, when he says the best Yiddish word for scoundrel is paskudnyak, the word leaves his mouth trailing saliva, so you must stand well back. On a different note, his eyes light up when he says tzatzkele meaning "a bit of all right." The gleam in his eye is not to be taken the wrong way.

Other of his favorites include trombinyak meaning a loud mouth, a yunger shneck for a smart alec, and a gornisht mit a gornish meaning a lazy, good for nothing, ne'er do well.

Some Yiddish words deliver their own complete images, Garnick says, quoting the Yiddish word podeshva, meaning sole of the foot. "Just saying the word, you can see all the corns, calluses, bunions and boils, and you want to go and soak your feet in water immediately."

Though there are a dozen ways to say a slap in the face in Yiddish, he insists the staple word is patch, but to get the full effect Garnick advises you say a friask in fresser arayn (a slap across the mouth).

One highlight of the conference, to be held at the Ontario Institute of Studies, 252 Bloor St. W. and the JCC Bloor branch, 750 Spadina Ave., is a lecture on The Life and Works of J.I. Segal, Oct. 8, by noted Montreal author and lecturer Chava Rosenfarb.

Another is a tribute Oct. 9 to Canadian poet and fabulist Peretz Miransky by Liba Augenfeld, augmentd by the Beth Tikvah Choir conducted by Srul Irving Glick and readings from Miranksy's works.

Also on the Sunday, Oct. 9 agenda is a bus tour of Jewish Toronto and a reception at the Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto.

The workshops, to be held Oct. 9 and 10, include one on Yiddish Folk Songs as Social History led by Naomi Bell, another on Yiddish Children's Songs for All Ages, by Ana Berman, Yiddish teacher at Bialik Hebrew Day School, and one led by Jason Berman, technical writer and native Yiddish speaker, on Yiddish in the Computer Age.

The Works of Yiddish Women Writers is the subject of one workshop and another one deals with women's issues, both led by Frieda Forman.

The Development of a Successful Yiddish Club is led by Richard Bassett, Yiddish activist and moderator, while teacher Henie Reinhartz will host a workshop on The Yiddish Resource Centre.

For further information call conference coordinator Bess Shockett at (416) 787-0526, or fax (416) 631-5718.

Winnipeg Shaare Zedek chapter set to honor Holocaust survivor

By MYRON LOVE
CJN Prairie Correspondent

WINNIPEG — On Nov. 17, the Winnipeg chapter of the Canadian Shaare Zedek Hospital Foundation will be honoring Holocaust survivor Philip Weiss with the hospital's Humanitarian Award for his outstanding efforts to keep the memory of the Holocaust alive both for Jews and non-Jews.

A survivor of several camps, Weiss came with his family to Winnipeg in 1948 and built up a successful business. Over the last 30 years or more, Weiss has been an active member of the Jewish community, having served as president of the Rosh Pina Synagogue and board member of the local chapters of both the Canadian Friends of the Hebrew University and the Canadian Friends of Ben-Gurion University.

Holocaust awareness has always been a part of his activities and especially so in the last 15 years. For 12 years, he chaired the community's Holocaust Remembrance Committee. He also chaired the Holocaust Memorial Committee, which was responsible for building the first memorial on public property in Canada on the grounds of the Manitoba Legislature in 1990.

With the release of Schindler's List last winter, Weiss has raised his own personal Holocaust awareness campaign several notches higher. With his own money, he has arranged special showings of the film to hundreds of non-Jewish Winnipeg students and their teachers, as well as members of other ethnic and religious communities.

In June, the Jewish National Fund bestowed on Weiss its Bloomfield Medal in recognition of his outstanding contributions to the Jewish people.

The featured guest speaker at the Shaare Zedek dinner honoring Weiss will be Prof. Jonathan Halevy, the medical centre's director-general. Proceeds from the evening will go towards the purchase of an intensive care respirator for the hospital's new Comprehensive Heart Institute — the newest and most modern heart unit of its kind in the world. It is expected to treat over 20,000 patients a year of all ages.

It's time to get your shots!

TORONTO — Grade 7 students across Ontario will soon be lining up for hepatitis B immunizations, as part of a government-sponsored program.

The $6-million immunization program will begin Oct. 11 and end May 6. The three-part vaccination will protect against the disease, which is the leading cause of liver cancer.

Hepatitis B is primarily spread through sexual contact, but may also be transmitted by transfer of body fluids, dirty needles, tattooing and ear piercing.

All Grade 7 students, including those in the Jewish day schools and yeshivot, are eligible for immunization. Participation is voluntary.

Ruby McBean, manager of the City of North York's immunization program, said the three injections may cause some redness but parents shouldn't be concerned about adverse reactions.

North York man reunited with Ukrainian cousin after 30 years of correspondence

By RUTH SCHWEITZER
Special to The CJN

From left: Marshall Sone, Belle Naiman, Sonya, Abby Sone, Rima Kravtsova, Anne Hirchberg, Bruna Rzhavtsev, and Elana Sone (in front).

TORONTO — For nearly 30 years a 78-year-old North York man corresponded regularly with his first cousin who until recently lived in Ukraine.

In July, when he saw the cousin he had never expected to meet, many tears of joy were shed.

Abby Sone's cousin, Rima Kravtsova, 82, immigrated to the United States from Ukraine last year with her daughter and son-in-law. Sone and the Canadian side of the family — two sisters, his son, his daughter and his grandaughter — met their Ukrainian relatives in Cleveland on the Canada Day weekend.

The family spent an emotional Friday afternoon discussing the past and the present, and that evening they all went out to dinner. "I don't think they had ever been to a restaurant," recalled Sone.

Sone's father, his mother and six aunts and uncles left Ukraine in 1905, settling in Toronto. One of his aunts, Liba, stayed behind because her husband was in the army.

Sone said his father Charles kept in touch with Liba, "whenever the mail went through." Charles lost track of Liba during the two wars but afterward he re-established contact through the Red Cross.

Liba died in the early '50s and her daughter took over the letter writing. When Sone's father died in 1966, his late wife Dorothy and his daughter Pamela insisted that he keep the correspondence going.

Sone and Kravtsova corresponded in Yiddish — he had picked up a little taking orders in his parents' grocery store at Dundas and Manning. "My knowledge of Yiddish wasn't that great and neither was hers," he said.

In her first letter to Sone, his cousin wrote: "We have everything. We do not need anything." She thought the mail was being censored, he said, and her main concern was to keep the correspondence going.

They wrote each other about every three weeks for 28 years. Many of the letters, he recalled, never reached their destinations.

In a 1982 letter, Kravtsova told Sone that she had been diagnosed with diabetes and medication was unavailable. Luckily he is a pharmacist and was able to send her two thousand diabetic pills.

Over the years he said he sent her many cheques, to which she would reply with, "Thank you for the gift," afraid to be more specific, again because she worried that her letters were read by censors.

When Kravtsova's husband died in 1992, Sone remembers being surprised that he had a full Jewish burial.

Right after her husband's death, Kravtsova's son-in-law, Zoker Rzhavtsev, developed melanoma from radiation caused by the nuclear accident at Chernobyl. Gomel, the town where the family lived, is 100 km north of Chernobyl.

Kravtsova's American brother-in-law sponsored the family, and they applied for exit visas. She wrote Sone of her ambivalence about leaving the country of her birth and the country in which her parents and husband were buried. He tried neither to encourage nor to discourage her.

When the family got their exit visas, they were forced to sell their homes and most of their possessions "practically for nothing," said Sone.

Sone asked his cousin to telephone him when she arrived in the United States in September 1993. He recalls that she "was afraid to talk on the phone in case someone had the phone bugged."

Her daughter's two children were not allowed to leave Ukraine, and in her first letter to Sone from the United States, Kravtsova wrote that she was going to Washington to apply to bring her grandchildren over. A son who lives in Moscow is also waiting to join the family in the States.

Kravtsova recently asked Sone for his daughter-in-law's address because she wants to write to her when she learns how to speak English. "She's quite a woman," he said.

Israel Kibbutz Choir set to tour

TORONTO — The Israel Kibbutz Choir will begin its tour of North America in Toronto.

This award-winning choir, under the musical direction of Avner Itai, includes 45 members from kibbutzim across Israel.

The choir performs regularly with the Israel Philharmonic Orchestra and has sung under the baton of Zubin Mehta, Daniel Barenboim, Georg Solti and Kurt Mazur, among others.

Included in the choir's repertoire are the best of the European choral works (from Palestrina to Penderecki), including both a cappella and accompanied works. Israeli and Jewish music receive special emphasis.

Since rehearsals take place at kibbutzim around the country, the choir performs concerts for all kibbutz members in the region where they are rehearsing.

The Israel Kibbutz Choir will be giving one performance only at 7:45 p.m. on Thursday, Sept. 29 at the Minkler Auditorium, Seneca College, 1750 Finch Avenue E., North York.

Jewish munitions expert saved by fellow Soviets during war

By RUTH SCHWEITZER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Thirty years after the event, a Jewish war veteran of the Soviet army discovered that his senior officers had spoken up for him when he was suspected of sabotage.

Khaim Multianer recently told his story to The CJN. A lieutenant in the engineering forces, in June 1943, Multianer was stationed at the front near the Russian city of Rostov located on the Don River.

With the railroad system destroyed, a nearby bridge was the Soviet troops' only link to food, ammunition and gasoline. But an order to rig the bridge with explosives in case of a German attack came down, and Multianer, leading a platoon of soldiers, was given this dangerous job.

Although he was selected for his qualifications — he is a civil engineer — being Jewish made him more trustworthy than other candidates in the eyes of his superiors.

"The Jewish people in the army were very loyal to the Soviet government," he recalled, because being captured by the Germans was a virtual death sentence for Jewish soldiers. "I think it was a key element why I got the work."

They laid more than ten thousand pounds of explosives and Multianer himself did the final electrical work. "I finished the work, I checked it, — it was done exactly as projected — I reported, then I forgot about it," he said.

In October, promoted to deputy chief of staff, he left the unit.

While on a business trip to Kiev in 1973, Multianer ran into the company commander he had left behind at Rostov 30 years earlier. His former commander, Colonel Sergay Osipov, arranged for a reunion with another officer from the unit, Brigade-Major Vorobey.

Over dinner an amazing story unfolded. First, Multianer noticed that the two other men exchanged knowing glances and then he says he heard one of them say, "Will we tell him or no?"

Khaim Multianer

Feeling ill at ease, he asked, "Hey guys, what is going on? Tell me, please."

The colonel and the major told Multianer that after he left Rostov, it was decided that blowing up the bridge was unnecessary, and an engineering unit disassembled the explosive system. They, however, failed to remove all of the explosives, and investigators from the military police, who thought Multianer had rigged more than he reported, suspected sabotage.

Before the military police could locate Multianer, the two officers, Osipov and Vorobey, assured them of Multianer's impeccable engineering qualifications and his loyalty. The investigators took the officers' word and ended their search for Multianer.

"In war time," Multianer said, "to protect a Jew, was a very big risk." Anyone stepping out on a limb for a Jew had to be absolutely sure they were telling the truth. "They protected me in the best way and saved my life."

If it had not been for the heroism of the two officers, Multianer would have been a victim of the harsh Soviet justice system.

"The USSR justice system was based on the assumption that the accused is guilty and it is his obligation to prove his innocence. In military court, at war time, that was impossible. And if the defendant was a Jew — [there] was only one solution — guilty with maximum punishment," he recalled.

Multianer, now 76, was decorated with the Red Cross Star and the Great Patriotic War Medal, as well as eight other medals. He fought in defence of Stalingrad in 1942, and after Rostov he was sent to fight in Romania, Hungary, Austria, Czechoslovakia and Manchuria. Finishing the war as a captain, he was promoted to the rank of major during a 1956 stint in the reserves.

After the war Multianer worked as a civil engineer. By the early '70s, he had risen to chief of the construction department of the Ukrainian Ministry of Agriculture's Odessa district.

Turned down for a promotion because he is Jewish, he decided he could stand the anti-Semitism no longer. "That was the last push," he said.

Multianer, along with his wife Sonya, his daughter, his son-in-law and his grandson, immigrated to Canada in 1975, settling in Toronto.

Although the University of Toronto's engineering faculty and the Association of Professional Engineers recognized his Ukrainian diploma from the Kharkov Automobile and Road Construction Institute, he was unable to find work in his field; employers wanted people with Canadian experience. He got some interviews, but young Canadian-educated graduates took the jobs.

With hardly a trace of bitterness, he said, "Maybe if I was the boss, I'd do the same."

Multianer became a downtown parking lot attendant in 1976, and 10 years later he retired at the age of 69.

In spite of the drop in professional status he took by coming here, he is glad he made the move. "I am lucky to be here," he said. "I am more than lucky."

Bill Berger (left) and Frank Miller, co-chairmen of the Baycrest Open Golf Tournament, get in a little putting practice before the fourth annual tournament began.

Golfers raise funds for Baycrest

TORONTO — Hundreds of enthusiastic golfers took to the fairways of the Aurora Highlands Golf Club recently.

They enjoyed perfect summer weather and raised money for programs at Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care at the fourth annual Baycrest Open. One of the largest charitable golf tournaments in Canada, this year's event raised more than $100,000 for Baycrest.

"The Baycrest Open gets bigger and better every year," says Frank Miller, of Baycrest's Leadership Development Group (LDG), which sponsors the event.

This year's tournament was a logistical triumph for the organizers who rose to the challenge of coordinating games on three separate courses and special events which included a morning barbecue and a post-game dinner for participants.

"The Baycrest Open is a lot of fun," says Miller. "It's a high quality event which delivers excellent value and one which golf lovers should definitely keep in mind for their 1995 season."

Eisner's pact becomes a fulfilling career

By LEILA SPEISMAN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — When Irving Eisner was a prisoner in a German labor camp during the war, he made a pact with G-d.

The 17-year-old promised that if G-d let him survive, he would devote his life to teaching young children.

"I saw how they were tearing kids from their mothers' arms and throwing them into the fire," he told The CJN in a recent interview at his Thornhill home. "I asked G-d, 'Who will pray to You if not children?' "

Eisner did survive, as did his father and one sister, and he kept his promise. This year he retired from Associated Hebrew Schools, after 46 years as a teacher, although he is still working half days as a supervisor at the school's Neptune branch.

As soon as he was liberated by the American troops, and went to a Displaced Persons camp, he says, "I assembled kids, and taught as much as I could."

Going to Israel with his new wife in 1949, he began his teaching career there. In 1953 the family (he now has three sons and nine grandchildren) came to Toronto where Eisner began teaching at Eitz Chaim.

After 10 years, he moved to Associated Hebrew Schools, under the late Dr. Levi Jacober. He taught Hebrew subjects, Tanach, Hebrew language and grammar, history, literature.

Irving Eisner

His love of teaching and of his students shines from his eyes and in his smile.

"A rabbi in the Talmud said that he learned from his parents and from his teachers, but most from his students. I did too."

His father warned him, he said, that if he became a teacher, "I would stay with the mind of a child. I don't mind that."

Eisner said that people ask him if he would become a teacher again. "I answer yes, certainly. Even if there is aggravation, I saw more pleasure, more sunshine."

He shared some of his philosophies of teaching. First, he said, a teacher must teach with devotion and believe in what he or she is teaching. "You have to live it. You can't teach children to keep Shabbat or to lay tefillen if you don't."

Most of all, he said, you must teach with joy. "You must make lessons enjoyable. Almost every class I had a joke, a song, or a story. It makes the children more attached to you."

Eisner taught elementary students, usually grade 5 or 6. He admitted that that is a hard age, but he finds it a challenge to deal with youngsters on the verge of leaving childhood.

It is not enough, he said, to just be a teacher — you have to be a friend as well.

He made it a point to inquire about family problems, as well as, he added with a twinkle, always knowing the hockey scores.

Paraphrasing a talmudic dictum, Eisner mused, "[A teacher] must bring closer with two hands, rather than pushing away."

Eisner remembers his own childhood, near Chust, Czechoslovakia. He went to cheder and yeshivah, like the other children, but then his father, an ardent Zionist, sent him to a Zionist Hebrew gymnasium in nearby Munkaz.

"Our rabbi was the Satmar rebbe, Rabbi Teitlebaum. He only agreed to let me go if I promised to keep my payes, and to be tested by him whenever I came home. My father had to hire me a special tutor to help me in Gemara, just so I could be tested properly."

As well as teaching, Eisner has produced a series of workbooks which are used at Associated, Heym Hayinu, which deal with laws and customs; and a series on books of the Chumash.

Workbooks on Bamidbar (Numbers) and Devarim (Deuteronomy) are already in use, and he plans to work on Shemot (Exodus) this year.

First trip back to Birkenau

Last year, Eisner accompanied the March of the Living as an advisor. It was his first trip back to Birkenau, where, on the first day of Shavuot 1944, his mother and two sisters were murdered right after their arrival. (A brother died shortly afterwards.)

"I didn't cry 50 years ago. I was too busy trying to stay alive. I didn't realize how terrible everything was. But now I cried. I didn't cry when I worked in Warsaw [during the war]. But I cried now."

He remembers collapsing at the gates of Birkenau, and being surrounded by students, who helped him up. "I asked them to say Kaddish with me."

Eisner picked up two stones from the camp, as symbols of his family and brought them to Israel, where he pushed them under the headstone of his father's grave.

"My son asked me whether I had noticed that one of the stones was burnt, as if it had been in a fire."

Eisner said he doesn't know why he survived when so many didn't. "I ate plain grass sometimes. I remember watching what animals ate in the fields, and I thought if cows could eat it, so could I. I stole vegetables from fields — never, G-d forbid — from people. To solace me, I prayed and sang songs I knew by heart.

"I learned that you have to fight, even when the rope is around your neck. It is easy to die. It is harder to stay alive."

Eisner tells the story of his life in the concentration and labor camps to children, not just his own students, but others as well.

"When I was speaking at Fleming High School in North York, a student asked me how I can still wear a yarmulke after everything that happened to me. I told them at least the yarmulke was left. At least the faith was left."

He said he will retire when he feels the time is right. "I like the kids so much, I don't want them to see me as anything but the best."

TRAVEL TALK

By BILL GLADSTONE

Holidays on the High Seas: The vast atrium features fountains, foliage, boutiques, bars and lounges on various levels. Light streams down from a skylight some seven stories high. No, this isn't the lobby of a grand hotel, merely the "Centrum" of the newly-inaugurated Royal Caribbean cruise liner, Legend of the Seas. With 902 cabins, the ship is spacious, as filled with diversions and entertainments as a small city — including a mini-18-hole golf course on the topmost deck.

Somewhat smaller, the twin-hulled, smooth-sailing SSC Radisson Diamond is no less spectacular. It boasts a five-story atrium, casino, piano lounge, and, of course, the obligatory Grand Dining Room.

In the 30 years since the modern cruise industry took off, Royal Caribbean, Radisson Diamond, Holland America, Norwegian and other cruise lines have launched a fleet of vessels that are actually floating hotels with rooms that often have verandahs and hotel-style mini-bars. Last year, some 4.4 million passengers travelled in such ships to the Caribbean, Alaska, Europe, Asia, the South Seas and other destinations.

That figure shows a sharp increase over the two million cruise passengers carried in 1980 and the million carried in 1970. According to New York-based cruise industry analyst Robert J. Kwortnik, the demand for cruises is growing by about 10 per cem annually.

Cruise ship inventory added

To accommodate this demand, cruise ship inventory is being added at about eight per cent annually. (Kwortnik says that abut 200,000 Canadians take cruises each year.)

"By the end of the decade, we envision that the cruise lines will carry some eight million passengers each year, based on current trends," says Kwortnik, who is the director of training for the Cruise Lines International Association. And the stereotypical seniority of the cruise passenger has dropped significantly, he says, from the era "when the average age of cruise passengers was deceased."

Kwortnik says he has seen people board ships as passengers and come off as cargo, but it is not the limitless quantity of food usually available on board that is the main draw. Neither is it the wide variety of on-board activities proffered from shuffleboard to the ubiquitous bingo by day, from glittering Las Vegas-style cabarets to nightclubs featuring music from Bach to rock by night. According to industry surveys, the top reason people go on cruises is for relaxation.

"Studies have shown that people have roughly 10 per cent less leisure time now than 10 years ago," Kwortnik observes. "Computers were supposed to give us more time, but that didn't happen."

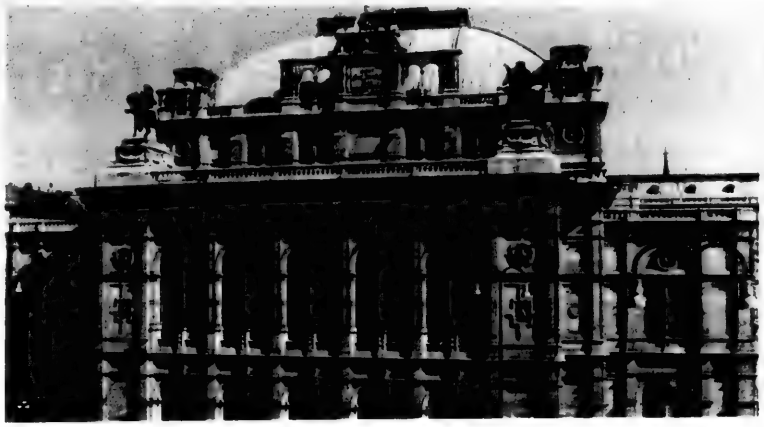
One negative factor associated with cruising is the perceived regimentation that comes when passengers are assigned specific times for dinner seatings, usually at 6.30 or 8.45 p.m. Another, of course, is the dreaded mal du mer — seasickness — for which Kwortnik advises passengers to bring medication with them, and not to overeat, overdrink or party too hard during the first 24 hours at sea.

High seas trip not cheap

Another deterrent is the cost. A vacation on the high seas is not cheap. Cruises may go for as much as about $8,000 per day for a deluxe cabin aboard the Queen Elizabeth II. (A five-day Atlantic first-class crossing aboard the QEII costs about $40,000 and includes a free return trip home aboard the Concorde.) Alternately, cruises may go for as little as about $125 per day. "On every ship, the first rooms to be sold are the most expensive," Kwortnik says. "The next rooms to be sold are the least expensive."

Average rack rates are about $200 to $225 US per day, or roughly $275 Canadian, on cruises of less than seven days' duration, says Kwortnik. But the so-called rack rate is the "great lie" of the cruise ship industry, he adds. Discounts of roughly 25 to 40 per cent are typical, especially for groups. These figures include almost all expenses except personal beverages aboard ship, additional land-based tours and activities, and gratuities to staff (at least $10 per day).

Numerous cruise lines include Israel in their itineraries of the Eastern Mediterranean. The "Holy Land, Greek Isles & Ancient Civilizations" cruise offered by Royal Cruise Lines, for example, stops in Rome, Naples, Cairo, Jerusalem (via a Mediterranean seaport, of course), Cyprus, Rhodes, Mytilini, Meteora and Athens. The Radisson Diamond Cruise offers a 12-hour stop at the Israeli seaport of Ashdod, gateway to the Judean Desert region, Jerusalem and other places in Israel.



Vienna's State Opera.

Vienna a product of bygone era

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
CJN Staff Reporter

VIENNA —Vienna seems altogether too splendid to be the capital of a small central European country like Austria.

With its imposing historic buildings, broad boulevards, bucolic parks, wonderful cafes, great restaurants, glittering shops, monumental statues and ornate fountains, Vienna is really too big for Austria.

But the explanation is deceptively simple. Vienna, the frenetic metropolis that we know and appreciate today, is the product of a bygone epoch, when Vienna reigned supreme as the mighty capital of the far-flung Habsburg empire.

Yet Vienna, which was once home to a brilliant Jewish community whose small numbers belied its achievements, hardly feels sorry for itself. This is a vital, self-confident city which does not appear to yearn for the glorious past.

Probably the heart and soul of Vienna is Stephanplatz, crowned by St. Stephen's Cathedral, a weathered Romanesque pile which dominates its skyline. Heavily damaged during World War II, it was hastily repaired and brought back to normal working order in a matter of years.

The mecca of young backpackers and conventional middle-class tourists alike, Stephanplatz is literally a stone's throw away from Vienna's main shopping streets — Karntnerstrasse and the Graben, which glitter with the allure of untrammelled consumerism.

And it is close to one of Vienna's cultural icons, the Staatsoper, the State Opera, where I had the pleasure of attending a performance of Puccini's Tosca.

Luciano Pavarotti had been billed as the lead tenor, but failed to appear due to sudden illness. There was a chorus of boos, but his replacement, whose name I've forgotten, was superb. When the curtains went down, he basked in the sustained applause.

Within walking distance of the Staatsoper is an enchanting ensemble of grand palaces, museums and public buildings called the Hofburg, which is dominated by the Spanish Riding School.

Renowned for its subtle equestrian ballets performed by stoic riders on handsome steeds, the Spanish Riding School is a perennial favorite with tourists.

The Heldenplatz, set off by magnificent gardens, is nearby. From a balcony here, in the aftermath of Nazi Germany's annexation of Austria in 1938, Adolf Hitler exhorted a multitude of adoring Viennese.

Some Austrians would rather forget their adulation of Hitler and Nazism. But history cannot be wished away or rewritten.

The splendor of the Habsburg period is best revealed at the Schonbrunn Palace, a masterpiece of Baroque architecture which was finished in 1712. Guided tours whisk you through the fairy-tale State Apartments. The formal gardens you can see on your own.

Vienna's parks are sedate. The Stadtpark, laced with pedestrian paths, is studded with statues of famous Viennese, including Johann Strauss Jr., the composer of The Blue Danube Waltz. The Burggarten, formerly the haunt of Habsburg emperors, celebrates Austria's most famous son in the form of yet another statue.

The park I enjoyed most of all was the Prater, with its pleasing mix of tangled woods and rolling manicured lawns. It lies between the Danube River and the Danube Canal, and is easily accessible from the centre of town.

I cycled through the Prater on a warm, sunny day, accompanied by Gerhard Auinger, my amiable Viennese acquaintance. The Prater was filled with picnickers and the aroma of grilled meat.

The nudist beach we passed surprised me, but I needn't have been. Nudist sunbathing is a sacrosanct tradition in Germanic culture. Needless to say, Gerhard took it in his stride.

In the late afternoon, after a pleasant pit stop at a Mexican-style outdoor restaurant, we reached the Riesenrad, the enormous Ferris wheel where The Third Man, that haunting 1949 movie, was filmed.

Vienna, of course, is noted for its museums. Take your pick, but Jewish visitors may be particularly interested in the Sigmund Freud Museum on Berggasee and the newly-reopened Jewish Museum on Dorotheerstrasse.

Viennese coffee, a legacy of 16th- and 17th-century Turkish Ottoman invasions, is justly famous in Vienna.

Coffeehouses like the Cafe Landtmann and the Cafe Demel, redolent of that hospitable spirit commonly referred to as gemutlichkeit, serve up rich, aromatic brews and some of the finest pastry in Europe.

Jazz musician making an attempt to interest young in Yiddish tunes

By BEN ROSE
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — A jazz musician who says he got the inspiration to do this at the Gates of Heaven, the oldest synagogue in Wisconsin, has set famous Yiddish and Hebrew melodies to a syncopated jazz beat.

The album, Life's a Lesson, with 15 numbers ranging from Eli, Eli to Hine Ma Tov, won't be everybody's cup of tea, but it's a refreshing attempt to attract younger people to our traditional music.

Certainly the six-minute long first cut, Eliyahu, will have you tapping your toes.

Ben Sidran, 50, the jazz pianist who did the arrangements for Life's a Lesson, attended a High Holy Day service at the Gates of Heaven, on the shore of Lake Wadena in Wisconsin near Madison.

"Jazz had always been at the centre of his life rather than spirituality, but that service with guitar accompaniment by Hannah Rosenthal, brought him back to his Jewishness," said Maxine Sidran, of Toronto, his sister, a TV producer with the CTV program, W5.

Now Ben Sidran, and his son, Leo, 17, play music at the alternative services in the one-room building, said to be the third oldest free-standing synagogue in the United States. The services attract standing-room only crowds.

Many readers may remember the hit song Space Cowboy from the '70s; its composer was Ben Sidran, then playing with the Steve Miller band. It was with the Steve Miller group that Sidran played in Toronto twice at the Kingswood Theatre at Canada's Wonderland.

Many Jewish musicians responded to Sidran's call for help on the album, including the folk singer Lynette and singer-songwriter Carole King. There are instrumentals by many contemporary Jewish jazz artists including Bob Berg, Randy Brecker, Eddie Daniels, Lee Konitz, Mike Mainieri and Josh Redman.

In addition to the numbers already mentioned, the album includes Oseh Shalom, Ani Ma'amin, Avinu Malkenu, Tree of Life, B'Rosh Hashana, Shofar Shogood, Y'Did Nefesh, Kol Nidre, Hashivenu, Hatikva and Face Your Fears.

The album, CD or cassette, is available through Go Jazz Records, P.O. Box 2023, Madison, WI, 53701, CD, $18; cassette, $14 (US).

Bonengel's documentary chilling

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
CJN Staff Reporter

Winfried Bonengel's documentary, Profession Neo-Nazi, is chilling precisely because it is neither preachy nor didactic.

Her 83-minute-long film focuses on a 27-year-old German neo-Nazi leader, Ewald Althans of Munich, and his Canadian mentor, convicted Holocaust denier Ernst Zundel of Toronto.

Bonengel's movie caused quite a stir in Germany last year. Critics complained that it lacked a sufficiently distinct point of view, and that it was, in effect, a vehicle for fascist propaganda.

True, Bonengel gives Althans and company free rein. In this sense, it is uncommonly objective.

On a deeper level, however, Profession Neo-Nazi is a subtle indictment of its central characters — vain, snickering, incorrigible Nazis who distort history and who want to reconstruct an era that most Germans reject.

Screened at the Toronto International Film Festival, Profession Neo-Nazi also serves a purpose as a warning. The leaders of the international neo-Nazi movement, despicable though they are, do not necessarily conform to facile stereotypes.

Some, like Althans and perhaps Zundel, are not storm-trooper types with shaved heads who rant and rave and sport Nazi regalia. They are superficially personable, well-spoken, charismatic to a degree, and not unintelligent. They represent the seemingly reasonable face of a fairly sophisticated enemy.

Profession Neo-Nazi begins in Toronto in Zundel's inner sanctum. Claiming he bears "a cross" for Germany, Zundel brags about his material success in Canada. He goes on to explain his philosophy and his "scientific" research about Jews. He tries on his concentration camp "habit." He is seen diligently opening letters containing money from admirers in Germany and the United States.

Zundel's inner sanctum

Althans, dressed like an up-and-coming executive, arrives at Zundel's headquarters. They form a mutual admiration society. Althans is "crazy" about Zundel. In turn, Zundel pays lavish tribute to Althans, his tall, handsome acolyte.

The film shifts as Althans talks with a Spanish neo-Nazi and with his parents, who obviously do not think highly of their son's noxious views. Indeed, his mother reveals that, even as a boy, he exhibited "extremist behavior."

Next, Althans is seen in western Poland conferring with ethnic Germans and arrogantly proclaiming that this is German territory.

He visits Auschwitz. "This place is bullshit," he snorts. Althans makes a spectacle of himself, getting embroiled in arguments with German visitors and with an incredulous Jewish man.

As the film ends, Althans delivers a forceful speech in eastern Germany, a breeding ground for neo-Nazism.

Propagandists like Althans and Zundel have learned to manipulate their ignorant, pliable followers. But hardly anyone else is fooled by their simplistic rhetoric. Certainly, Bonengel is not. With deftness, she exposes their ilk.

BOOKS

By BERNARD BASKIN

The Arabists, by Robert D. Kaplan (The Free Press, $24.95 US)

Most of them disliked Jews and regarded the creation of the State of Israel as an unmitigated disaster. They opposed American intervention to open up the Tiran straits on the eve of the Six Day War and argued against the dispatch of arms to Israel during the Yom Kippur War. Towards Saddam Hussein — and other Arab dictators — they advocated a policy of judicious appeasement. They were unprepared and astonished by the Gulf War.

These were the Arabists of the American State Department, highly regarded specialists in the culture, religion and politics of the Near Eastern countries. Many of them had studied at the American University of Beirut where they acquired a knowledge of Arabic and understandable sympathy for the Arab national movement.

How, they asked, could American governments from Truman to Reagan, sacrifice good relations with Arab millions for the sake of a small, insecure, Western inspired state? They predicted years of controversy, violence and a drain on American money and resources.

Some of these fears, of course, were well founded, but the critic Francis Fukuyama has faulted the Arabists as "more systematically wrong" than any other branch of the foreign service.

In the '70s profound changes took place when Joseph Sisco, a second generation Italian with no experience in Middle Eastern matters was appointed to the position of assistant secretary of state for Near Eastern affairs. He removed biased diplomats and opened the once hallowed halls of the department to members of minorities, including Jews.

The dramatic rescue of the Falasha Jews from the Sudan, described in the book in full detail, was a splendid success for the Arabists.

Kaplan begins his informative account with the arrival of American missionaries in Greater Syria at the beginning of the last century. In time they created the esteemed American University of Beirut which provided higher education for a developing Arab elite and for future U.S. diplomats.

The Arabists, always perceptive and entertaining — and not unsympathetic to a well-meaning, high-minded but severely limited and flawed group — will be welcomed by persons concerned with the past and future of Israel and with those entrusted with furthering U.S. policy.

ELIAS CANETTI 1905-1994

When he was awarded the Nobel Prize for Literature in 1981, almost everyone was astonished.

Who was Elias Canetti? Encyclopedias and handbooks yielded only scant information. Eventually, both author and work became better known and appreciated.

Canetti was born in Bulgaria and reared in a Ladino-speaking Sephardi milieu. He received his doctorate in chemistry from the University of Vienna.

Several years before the outbreak of World War II, he settled in England but continued to write in German. His voluminous works include plays, essays and a three-volume intellectual autobiography.

Of his vast oeuvre only two books have become widely known by English readers: Auto da Fe and Crowds and Power. The first of these is a novel about a reclusive scholar with a huge library, a man of intellect and ideas who is brutalized by a sadistic and ignorant housekeeper. He dies in an act of self-immolation. The book is a symbolic interpretation of events in Europe where the ignorant and violent have achieved power and rendered the sensitive and educated defenceless. The book was banned by the Nazis.

The other work is an original and wide ranging essay on the psychology of the mass mind. It searches for the well springs of human behavior, especially in fascism.

It does not appear that Canetti was concerned with Judaism either in his life or in his writings. He was buried in Zurich next to the grave of James Joyce.

BILL GLADSTONE'S EYE ON ARTS

New Biography of David Cronenberg: Twenty years ago this summer, this reporter was a 20-year-old film student at York University, who had been lucky enough to find some meagre employment as a pre-production assistant for a $180,000-budget feature film being shot in Montreal. The working title was Orgy of the Blood Parasites; the director was David Cronenberg; and one of the co-producers was Ivan Reitman.

Although it eventually earned about $5 million, the film did not achieve any great fame or popularity in Canada, neither under its original name nor under its subsequent title of Shivers; in fact, it garnered some famously scathing reviews. Cronenberg and Reitman, however, independently went on to achieve astonishing successes as director and producer, respectively, of many box-office smashes. Cronenberg has attained critical respect and a wide cult following as a horror-fantasy film director whose films — M. Butterfly, Naked Lunch, The Fly, The Dead Zone, Dead Ringers, among others — have been screened around the world. Reitman, meanwhile, has produced some of Hollywood's biggest box-office draws — Animal House, Stripes, Ghostbusters, Meatballs, et al.

Production assistant

I had worked with Cronenberg as a production assistant on a film in Toronto in 1973 — finding him highly intelligent, genial, sensitive and gifted — and he had allowed that I might work with him again in Montreal. When I first arrived, he put me up in his apartment on Nun's Island for a few nights.

As I recall, he kept an aquatic bloodsucking leech in suspended animation in a water-filled mayonnaise jar in his fridge. This repugnant wormlike creature, apparently his pet, was needed for special effects. He seemed to take great pleasure in bringing it to room temperature and, as it would begin to strive hungrily for nourishment, in feeding it bloody pieces of raw liver fresh from the butcher. He asked me to care for this thing while he went to Los Angeles, and left me the script of Blood Parasites to read.

Later, he seemed not to mind when, in answer to his direct questions, I confessed that I wasn't crazy about the script — it seemed exploitative, lurid and depraved. My naive youthfulness had blinded me into presuming that such frank admissions were permissable between friends and didn't intrude upon loyalty.

Cronenberg was easy-going, hardly the egomaniacal type. But he reported my opinion to Reitman, with whom it apparently raised doubts (as Cronenberg later told me) as to my continued employability beyond pre-production. Eventually, Reitman callously elucidated several reasons to me in private why he was reluctant to hire me during production — my French wasn't good enough, I was too fat, etc. — so I returned home to Toronto. Thus ended my own brief cinematic career.

A flashback of this interlude from half a lifetime ago ran through my mind recently after I perused a highly interesting and detailed new biography of the director whose career course has far surpassed even the optimistic prognostications of his numerous boosters of two decades ago.

David Cronenberg: A Delicate Balance (ECW Press, $14.95), by York University film instructor Peter Morris, is a finely researched, comprehensive study of the life and works of the controversial auteur whom some consider a genius in the Hitchcockian mode, responsible for some of the big screen's most horrifying images. Others, as Morris notes, regard his movies (especially the earlier ones) as grotesque and repulsive.

As the book carefully chronicles, the negative critical reception to Shivers nearly ruined Cronenberg. In a review in Saturday Night, entitled You Should Know How Bad This Film Is — After All, You Paid For It, critic Robert Fulford argued that the film displayed such atrocious bad taste that it was indefensible that some $75,000 in public funds had been invested in its production. Evidently, Cronenberg's landlady eventually evicted him from his apartment on the strength of what Fulford had written, setting in motion a Kafkaesque nightmare for him.

Cronenberg's initial reaction to the Fulford piece was placid acceptance, but he eventually came to resent it bitterly, as he explained in an article in The Globe and Mail. He also wrote that he realized that he was not exempt "from the fabled insecurity of the artist, the seer, the prophet, the Jew, the alien who can live happily in someone else's house or country only until he is . . . recognized. Then it's the knock on the door in the middle of the night."

Fans of Cronenberg or the cinematic horror genre should find this book worth reading. Readers of this column may also find two other recent titles from ECW Press of interest. They are Leonard Cohen: A Life in Art, by Ira Nadel, and Mina's Story: A Doctor's Memoir of the Holocaust, by Dr. Mina Deutsch. Each title is $14.95.

Little Odessa captures dark side of one Jew

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
CJN Staff Reporter

The Brighton Beach district of Brooklyn is home to a colony of Russian Jewish emigres. Here Russian is spoken and the ambience is that of Moscow, St. Petersburg or Odessa.

This neighborhood is the venue of Little Odessa, James Gray's hard-boiled film of a wanton killer and his relationship, such as it is, with his family.

It was screened at the Toronto International Film Festival.

The focus is on the Shapiras — a divided, dysfunctional Jewish family who've been in the United States for a while.

The black sheep of the family, Josh, is a heartless criminal, a hired hitman who kills dispassionately. Josh, played to perfection by Tim Roth, is alienated from his strong-willed father (Maximilian Schell), but drawn to his younger brother Reuven (Edward Furlong) and his dying mother (Vanessa Redgrave).

When Josh tries to visit his bed-ridden mother, the conflict between himself and his father intensifies. Reuven, a studious boy, is caught in the middle.

But Little Odessa is not just about a bitter family feud. It's a chilling portrait of what Oliver Stone might describe as a "natural born killer." Josh dispatches victims, and burns their bodies, with ruthless efficiency. Simply put, he's a killing machine, certainly not a nice Jewish boy!

The milk of human kindness drips from his soul only when he interacts with his girlfriend Alla (Moira Kelly) and with Reuven, or when he cradles his cancer-ridden mother in his arms. Josh's deviant behavior is never explained, but explanations are not really needed.

In Little Odessa, surface impressions are sufficient — and disturbing — enough.

Is Little Odessa a microcosm of the Russian-Jewish mafia in New York City? Probably. To the best of my knowledge, no previous film has dealt, even indirectly, with this topic.

More importantly, though, it's a sadly captivating portrait of a family at odds with each other.

Little Odessa marks Gray's feature debut. It's an auspicious start. Gray, 24 is a director of integrity and maturity.

Holy Blossom used for Global TV series

By AMY SATTIN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — It is lunchtime and the basement social hall of the Holy Blossom Temple is packed with diners gobbling down a pareve meal, with chocolate cake for dessert.

Laura Bertram, 16, sits down with her plate. It's been a tough morning for the young actor. She has just been pelted with eggs and abuse in her role of 13-year-old Amanda Zimm, a lead character on Ready or Not, the acclaimed adolescent television series now in its second season on Canwest-Global.

The scene, shot at the synagogue on a sunny Tuesday in August, depicts the first time Amanda encounters anti-Semitism. Bertram, a Roman Catholic, says it is almost enough to dissuade the Jewish character she plays from having a bat mitzvah.

"It really scares her," says the affable teen between bites of spaghetti. "She learns that if you are accepted into one group, you may not be accepted by the rest of the world."

The room empties. Lunch is over. Bertram, along with the 150 crew members and 75 extras, is hustled away to get ready for the next scene, a Shabbat service to be filmed in Holy Blossom's main sanctuary.

Bringing up the rear is Ready or Not creator Alyse Rosenberg, 32. The series grew out of her master's thesis at Columbia University's film school, a short film called Thirty-two Double A "about the first time a girl wears a bra," Rosenberg says.

But it was the relationship between the Jewish teen and her Catholic best friend that formed the basis for Ready or Not, first produced for Global's New Producers Series in January 1992. Rosenberg says the two teens represent both sides of her personality.

"But Busy [Ramone, played by Jewish actor Lonni Billard] is who I've always wanted to be — strong, not easily intimidated, independent," she says. "Amanda is more easily influenced."

One of those who influence her is Amanda's bubbie, played by actor Roselle Stone. In the episode being filmed that day Stone's character presents Amanda with the family's heirloom candlesticks. The segment ends with the women lighting the Shabbat candles.

Back in the Holy Blossom sanctuary, the crew tapes down snaking electrical wires and adjusts the lights. Rosenberg, who is directing this episode, blocks out the action on the pulpit.

Series consultant Rabbi Larry Pinsker of the Reconstructionist Congregation Darchei Noam is playing himself. He goes through the motions of unwrapping the Torah.

"This is the first episode in which Amanda's Jewishness becomes a major concern," he says between takes. He began working on the series after officiating at Rosenberg's wedding last June.

Dr. Rob Silver's rich tenor floats over the kreig lights. He is rehearsing his role as the cantor. The endocrinologist stops and says playing the cantor isn't a stretch: he acts as back-up cantor at Rabbi Pinsker's shul.

"He's just a ham," says Rabbi Pinsker affectionately of his co-star. "A kosher ham, mind you, but still a ham."

Laura Bertram is ready for the scene. She has changed her egg-stained clothes for a modest blue dress — the synagogue is standing in for the fictitous Conservative Temple Emunah.

She bounces on the wooden bench. "These are a lot more comfortable than the pews in my church," she says.

It will take more than 50 hours of filming to produce one 22-minute episode, and Bertram knows they are only partway through. She flashes a big smile. It is going to be a long afternoon, and she couldn't look any happier.

Reaction to the capital gains tax

Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM — Finance Minister Avraham Shohat closed the Tel Aviv Stock Exchange after announcing a 10 per cent capital gains tax on investments — the first time such a tax has been applied in Israel.

In announcing the measure, Shohat said the capital gains tax represented a measure of social justice in taxation policy.

He said he did not expect the measure to cause any serious jolt to the stock exchange, but he closed the exchange for several days in order to give market officials and investors a chance to plan their investments in light of the announcement.

The 10 per cent tax on profits and dividends from investments "has been long in the air, much talked about," Shohat noted. "Now it is time to act."

Oh, woe is me

Israel News Service

ISRAEL — There is almost nothing that affects the Israeli psyche more than the word boursa.

The Israel stock exchange has probably been responsible for more people losing their homes, their shirts and their wives, than almost any other single institution. But primarily the exchange was an inspiration to almost every Israeli who at last had a way of making a legal, tax-free quick buck.

Now all this has changed. From the beginning of next year there will be a 10 per cent capital gains tax.

The recent announcement by the government cast a sombre cloud over all who play the exchange tables; it was as if another Middle East War was on the verge of starting.

The exchange was closed for two days to enable the punters to take advice and calculate how they would manage to live with just a 90 per cent gain in their chosen shares. There was a cry from the heart. What shall we do to offset our profit when some shares we buy don't make any money?

Ah, says the government. Ah, says the Bank of Israel. The punter has a point here; maybe we should have thought out the tax a little more carefully. Now, in true Israeli style, follows the first amendment.

On August 21 the exchange reopened and, not unexpectedly, stocks plunged by as much as 15 per cent. As the day went on, the shares improved and by the close of the day, the market showed an overall decline of almost 10 per cent. The next day there was an overall gain of about two per cent.

The tax should help to stabilize prices. Often in the past, companies with sound management and a first class marketing record have seen their shares drop for no apparent reason.

Coinciding with the announcement of the new tax, the government lowered purchase tax on a variety of items including air conditioners, car parts, telephones and computers.

It also announced further liberalization in the economy in the field of overseas investments.

What percentage of reduction the consumer will see will depend on how much the supplier passes on to the consumer. The consumer in Israel is very unsophisticated when it comes to comparing prices. Unlike consumers in other western countries who will not buy when prices go up, the Israeli consumer will buy — in case the price goes up even further.

In Israel there is no effective watch-dog for the consumer, although the consumer himself is his own worst enemy when it comes to protecting his interests.

Inflation is still a very serious problem. At the moment, inflation is running at 14.5 per cent annually. In July, the consumer price index jumped by 1.1 per cent. This rise was in no small way fueled by the continuous rise in house prices. In the first quarter of 1994 house prices rose on average by almost three per cent. In Tel Aviv the rise was almost five per cent.

Although the index has risen over seven per cent so far this year, workers' statutory compensation is about half this figure. Although more and more companies are returning bigger profits, more and more people are also falling below the official government-set poverty line.

The government is spending heavily on road and rail improvements all over the country. Its stated desire is to improve public transport and prevent complete closure of the roads around the big cities by the ever-growing number of new vehicles coming onto the roads every month.

In a perfect example of shooting itself in the foot, the government has just allowed a completely unnecessary price hike in bus fares. The government has shot itself in the fiscal foot many times before and will soon be running out of pinkies.

TIPS FROM PROS

By JOHN SYRTASH
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — As a result of two recent Supreme Court of Canada cases, employers now appear to have a legal duty to pay for all religious holidays.

This duty would be in addition to statutory holidays, normal vacation pay and other benefits. Are these decisions allowing more time with God, or do they constitute a threat to hiring?

The court ruled that unions are also legally bound to support any member who needs legal "time out" to celebrate such a holiday.

The only exception to these rules apply to employers who would suffer "undue hardship" if they were to accommodate an employee in such a manner. Some hardship is not enough. The employer must show a significant loss of profitability or threat to the viability of his business by paying for these extra days before he is relieved of the employee's legal right to such payment.

In Chambly vs. Bergevin, a Quebec school board was recently ordered by the court to pay three Jewish employees for time taken off for Yom Kippur in addition to the other paid holidays and vacation pay. The court ruled that it would contravene the employees' legal human rights if the board was permitted to pay fellow non-Jewish workers for Christian holidays, but not Jews for theirs.

In an earlier case, Central Okanagan School Board District vs. Renaud, a school board and a union refused to accommodate a worker who couldn't work a normal Monday-through-Friday shift because of his sabbath, which commenced on Fridays.

The court ruled that an employer must take reasonable measures "short of undue hardship" to accommodate an employee's religious beliefs and practises. It ordered the employee's reinstatement — he had been fired for refusing to work the normal shift — and awarded him a significant amount of damages, being lost pay. Even the union was fined.

Most Jews know observant Jews celebrate the Sabbath by, among other things, abstaining from work, travel, or even carrying money in most cases.

However, similar prohibitions apply to the following major Holy Days: Rosh Hashanah (2 days), Yom Kippur (1 day), Sukkot (4 days), Passover (4 days), and the day on which we received the Torah, Shavuot (2 days).

In theory, if all of these days fell during the week, the employer could be obligated to pay for as many as 13 days per year in addition to the normal two weeks off with pay and all the other statutory holidays. It is unlikely that in most cases the courts or human rights commissions would now sanction "exchanging" statutory vacation days for religious days off. These are new additional rights and the employer is usually obliged to accept the employee's religious days off.

These cases are excellent news for those already employed with financially secure employers. If they and their families had always wanted to observe the Holy Days properly but had been prevented from doing so, they can now legally insist on getting paid for these days, in most cases.

However, there could be some problems. Employers cannot legally ask about one's religious practises when interviewing a job applicant. However, I suspect the employer may nonetheless quietly discriminate against observant job applicants — Jews, Muslim or otherwise — if he suspects the applicant is religious.

An irate employer might also fire an employee for other reasons so he cannot be accused of discriminatory practises. Of course, the same arguments were canvassed by critics when other employment protection laws were enacted, such as laws to protect handicapped applicants and female applicants (employers often fear that a child-bearing age applicant will become pregnant just after she's become indispensible to the operation).

Nonetheless, employers have learned to live with such constraints. Child-bearing age women now account for a sizeable share of the work force, including the professions. Of course some religious job applicants will simply not be hired for "other reasons" and some may even be fired. In such cases, only the most aggressive and diligent job seeker will see through the excuses given and lodge a complaint with a human rights commission. Our joy must therefore be somewhat tempered by the realities of the marketplace.

However, we should still rejoice in these cases. Who knows? They may even encourage families to discover that Judaism is rich and exists beyond Rosh Hoshanah, Yom Kippur and the Passover seder (even if everyone else ends up at the movies).

Bauhaus: simple lines in a harmony of mass space

Jerusalem Dateline

In the 1930s and 1940s the Bauhaus style of architecture came to Tel Aviv. During these years, dozens of well-known architects left their countries, especially Germany, and began to rebuild their lives — and their houses — in what is today a modern metropolis and Israel's largest commercial and financial centre.

Tel Aviv is, in fact, the city with the greatest concentration of buildings in the Bauhaus style, about 1,000 of which have been marked for preservation as historic landmarks. In recognition of the importance of its Bauhaus heritage, Israel recently paid a tribute to the creative men and women responsible for it.

A veritable festival took place throughout the country, with professional and student exhibitions, educational programs, a film festival, theatrical events and open-air activities.

Perhaps the most important event was a week-long international conference co-sponsored by UNESCO and the Tel Aviv-Jaffa Municipality, which brought together hundreds of architects and civil engineers from 20 countries around the world.

The Bauhaus movement sprang from a social philosophy which stressed the democratization of human welfare. It fit well with the pioneering spirit prevalent in Israel at the time.

Simple lines in a harmony of mass space, sculptured terraces between pillars rising from the ground to stairwells and rooftops, and the color white characterized the movement's functional expression of minimalism. This period of construction expressed a belief in the creation of a better and more just society.

Mid-East focuses on environmental issues

Jewish Telegraphic Agency

WASHINGTON — The steady move toward peace in the Middle East has fostered productive cooperation between Israel and its Arab neighbors on environmental issues.

Israel could not devote the time, energy and resources for the environment "when we were allocating a lot of our national budget for the security of Israel," according to Israel Peleg, director-general of the Israeli Ministry of the Environment.

"Now that there is a better atmosphere in the Middle East it is the perfect time for the environment," Peleg told reporters at a recent briefing at the Israeli Embassy here.

One key indication of cooperation on environmental issues is the extent of progress being made at the multilateral talks on the environment.

It is "not surprising" that the multilateral working group on the environment has made more progress than the groups on arms control, refugees and economics and welfare, according to Peleg, who was in Washington to discuss ways to increase cooperation on the environment between Israel and the United States.

"The cliche that the environment and pollution do not know borders is a reality in our region, especially when the borders are so close," he said.

Another indication of cooperation is the venue of the next round of talks. The talks, slated to begin Oct. 24, will be held in Bahrain.

Although Israel has no diplomatic relations with Bahrain, Israeli officials, headed by Peleg, will attend the talks with their Arab neighbors to continue the progress made on environmental issues during negotiation over the past two years.

Peleg pointed to a recent agreement signed by Israel and Jordan as another example of how cooperation on the environment is moving ahead rapidly in the Middle East.

A week before Israeli Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin and King Hussein of Jordan signed the July 25 Washington Declaration ending the 46-year state of war between their two countries, officials from the two countries, meeting in tents straddling the Israeli-Jordanian border, signed an agreement to cooperate in protecting the region's environment.

Peleg and Jordanian negotiators initialed a four-page agreement which has already begun to be implemented, according to Peleg.

"It was very moving to see that it is not only us, but also the Jordanians, that are so eager to go ahead in this peace on the environment," Peleg said.

The agreement, which protects the Gulf of Eilat and Aqaba, the Rift Valley, the Dead Sea and the area from the Red Sea to the Dead Sea, says: "Jordan and Israel acknowledge the importance of the ecology of the region, its high environmental sensitivity and the need to protect the environment and prevent danger and risks for the health and well-being of the region's population."

During his trip to the United States, Peleg met with officials from the Environmental Protection Agency, including Administrator Carol Browner, to discuss the Memorandum of Understanding the United States and Israel have on the environment.

Peleg said he believes that increased cooperation with the EPA will help Israel with its efforts to implement new environmental projects such as air monitoring systems, emission standards and protection of the ozone layer and rivers.

"It is about time to give the MOU higher visibility and more extensive cooperation," he said. "We can learn much more from the American experience than we have so far."

TerraQuest investigates the origin of toxic waste

By RUTH SCHWEITZER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Some unscrupulous companies are illegally dumping hazardous waste in fields in northern Ontario, but strict environmental regulations mean landowners are responsible.

To avoid a fine and a very expensive cleanup, a landowner must discover the culprit.

Environmental investigator Eugene Muller, the president of the newly-formed TerraQuest Environmental Strategies Corporation, could determine where the hazardous waste originated by analyzing the chemical in the soil.

"When you find out what the chemical is, you can pretty well find out where it came from through investigative technique," he said.

Certified environmental investigators like Muller are a new breed. He handles the scientific work such as gathering soil samples — they go to a lab for analysis — and he is a sleuth.

Until recently two experts, a scientist and someone with a law-enforcement background, would investigate incidents of illegal dumping or other environmental damage.

Muller, who has a 20-year background in the security field, is a graduate of Richmond Hill's Canadian Institute for Environmental Investigations. This June, a month after graduation, he became the vice-chair of the Association of Certified Environmental Investigators.

He founded TerraQuest with Gino Giancola, Tracey Jones and Brad Nosworthy. The foursome were in the top five of their class of 21 and the second group to finish the institute's five-month-long course.

Contaminant

TerraQuest conducts environmental assessments for companies and individuals, Muller said, before they purchase land that could be an environmental disaster. "Today if you go to a bank to buy land they would want a complete environmental assessment."

An environmental assessment of a site includes an investigation of land, water and air pollution, as well as potential contaminant sources, a review of historical records, and an examination of a company's policies regarding the handling of hazardous waste.

So far, the company has given two sites clean bills of environmental health, but the results of an assessment they did when they were students was not as favorable.

"We now have on file that this piece of land is contaminated," Muller said.

Environmental assessments, though, are only one aspect of TerraQuest's many activities.

They provide an environmental management service for companies that are faced with applying steadily growing environmental legislation. Directors, he says, are concerned about the fines for non-compliance and negative exposure in the media.

TerraQuest performs waste audits for companies, to help them comply with the government 3Rs regulation. Under the regulation, large companies have to reduce their waste output to landfill sites by 35 per cent by 1996 and by 50 per cent in the year 2000.

"We can accomplish that by putting in programs for reducing, reusing and recycling," Muller noted.

A recent waste audit TerraQuest did for Nestle Canada Inc. turned up some excellent results for the company.

"Nestle's is a very conscious company," he says. They found that Nestle's had already reduced their waste to landfills by 48 per cent and that "they can further reduce to a maximum of 76 per cent landfill-free waste."

TerraQuest looked at how each of Nestle's departments — there are 21 departments that produce 24 different types of waste — can reduce their waste and what they can recycle.

TerraQuest's packaging audits aim to assist a company in reducing packaging and determining if recycled or reusable materials can be used. If, for example, a package is made up of a box within a box, Muller said, they figure out "how it can be repackaged to use fewer boxes or how they can use recycled material."

Safety audits include going through a company's procedures for handling and storing hazardous materials as well as training staff.

Seminars for municipalities who want to learn how to implement a blue box program or for anyone who wants information about the 3Rs are part of TerraQuest's educational activities. They will be developing educational programs on "first response" — how to respond to an environmental hazard — for police and fire departments.

Muller is the chair of Beth Avraham Yoseph's security committee and a member of B'nai Brith. He and his wife Rochelle have four children.

This week The CJN features . . .The Oshawa Group Limited

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN

TORONTO — The Oshawa Group Limited is one of Canada's largest distributors of food and pharmaceuticals.

It is the supplier to 1,452 franchise markets, 656 of which are IGA stores; it owns and operates 142 Pharma Plus Drugmarts and 111 supermarkets, including 35 Food City stores; and its food service division, Serca Foods, is the largest food service supplier in the country.

With sales for 1993 of $5.7 billion, the Oshawa Group has been ranked the 17th largest company in Canada. It employs more than 17,000 people, not including franchise employees.

This huge company started as a wholesale produce company of very modest proportions.

In 1911 Max Wolfe bought a horse and cart and began delivering fresh produce door to door. Three years later he and his brother Maurice founded the Ontario Produce Company, which they operated from a stall in the old Toronto fruit and vegetable market.

Over the next 30 years the company evolved into a major importer/exporter and wholesaler of fresh produce, supplying retailers, institutional customers, and other wholesalers.

But by 1948 its biggest customers, the large grocery chains, began importing their own produce. The company needed to find a new market.

The late Ray Wolfe (Maurice's son), the past chair and CEO of the Oshawa Group, was the general manager of the Ontario Produce Company in 1948. He saw the potential in developing the independent grocery store as a new source of business.

Ray Wolfe acquired Oshawa Wholesale Limited, a small distributor of groceries, tobacco, confectionery and health and beauty products, and through this new company he was able to expand the range of products being supplied to the independents.

By 1951, Wolfe was supplying 750 independent stores. Their combined buying power created the necessary volume to keep their prices competitive, said Tim Carter, vice president of public affairs for the Oshawa Group.

"This allowed the independent grocers to take on the grocery chains," he said.

In 1951 Wolfe obtained the first Canadian franchise of the Chicago-based Independent Grocers Alliance (IGA). About 50 stores became franchises; this enabled them to buy, advertise, merchandise and sell under a single banner. The number of IGA stores increased significantly after 1959 when Oshawa Wholesale Ltd. absorbed the parent company, Ontario Produce, and became a publicly traded company.

Between 1968 and 1972 the company expanded beyond Ontario by acquiring all the IGA suppliers in every province but British Columbia. Today more food is sold under the IGA banner than any other banner in Canada, Carter said.

The money raised through the issuing of public shares was used to set up corporate IGA stores as well as a company-owned discount supermarket chain called Food City. It was the first discount supermarket in the country, Carter said.

The Food City that would be most familiar to CJN readers is located at Hilda and Clark in Thornhill. This sprawling 30,000-square-foot store has a 3,000-square-foot kosher food department which has been renovated and expanded twice in eight years.

"We misjudged how large it should be. We had to expand it," Carter said.

The department includes two grocery aisles, a glatt kosher butcher shop which kashers meat on the premises, a deli, a fish market, a dairy section and a full-scale bakery.

The variety of products in the kosher department is a convenience for shoppers, said Peter Marturano, the store manager. "It's one-stop shopping for all your kosher needs."

He said the department is unique. "We are the only location (in North America) with a glatt kosher butcher shop within a supermarket."

To be glatt kosher the supermarket must have a rabbi on the premises from the opening to the closing of the kosher department. Rabbi Moshe Bensalmon is on duty during the day, while a second rabbi, Rabbi Haim Edery, comes early in the morning — when the bakery staff arrive — and returns in the evening.

The rabbis make sure that all the operations of the kosher department adhere strictly to Halachah. They approve the deliveries of meat, fish and deli before they can be accepted into the kosher part of store. The rabbis are on hand to supervise the kashering procedures: deveining, soaking and salting the meat.

Marturano said the store gives customers the best possible price on kosher food. The staff do price checks with their competitors to make sure the kosher items are competitively priced, he said.

"Nine out of 10 times our prices are lower because of the size of our operation. Our customers expect it."

An Unusual Partnership

JERUSALEM — A member of the Saudi Arabian nobility and a Jewish merchant prince have shaken hands on a deal that makes them co-owners of San Francisco's historic Fairmont Hotel — for starters.

The new partners are Richard Swig, scion of one of the most eminent Jewish families in San Francisco for generations, and Prince Alwaleed Bin Talal Bin Abdulaziz Al Saud.

Alwaleed has acquired a 50 per cent stake in three Fairmont hotels owned by the Swig family. Included is the chain's flagship landmark property atop Nob Hill in San Francisco, and two others in Dallas and New Orleans.

Swig retains full control of the Fairmont properties in San Jose and Chicago.

The price paid by the 37-year-old Alwaleed has not been disclosed, but he also pledged to invest some $50 million for badly needed renovations of the hotels.

Swig said he was approached by Alwaleed over a year ago.

Alwaleed will be chair of the new partnership, with Swig serving as vice-chair.

The new partners intend to buy as many as 25 other hotels in the next five to seven years.

No specific sites have been picked, but the hotels will probably be scattered throughout Europe, Canada and the United States.

Complaints Against the European Union

JERUSALEM — The European Union has not kept its promises on agricultural trade with Israel and has failed to treat it as an equal with other countries, Agriculture Minister Ya'acov Tsur said during a meeting with Foreign Minister Shimon Peres.

The meeting was held before Peres left for Germany later in the day. Tsur asked him to seek significant improvements in trade conditions from the union during his visit.

About 90 per cent of Israel's fresh agricultural exports go to Europe. Yet, Tsur said, Israel is still paying tariffs which are unfair compared with the preferential treatment extended to many other countries.

Tsur said European farmers are heavily subsidized compared with Israeli farmers — some 60 per cent of the union's budget is allocated to agriculture.

He said subsidies amount to 55 per cent of the value of union agricultural produce compared with 25 per cent in Israel. Israel, in addition, faces competition from Third World countries with significantly lower labor costs.

Zvi Alon, deputy director general of foreign trade at the Agriculture Ministry, said the union has eased trade conditions for several other states in recent years.

Industrial Production Rises

JERUSALEM — Industrial production grew at an annual rate of eight per cent during the first half of the year, the Central Bureau of Statistics reported.

The rise follows increases of 10 per cent in the second half of 1993 and five per cent during the first half of last year.

Industrial production rates varied significantly during the first half of the year. From May through June, industrial activity turned more vigorous and jumped 12 per cent.

$20 Million Contract For Tadiran

JERUSALEM — Tadiran has won a contract to supply communications equipment valued at $20 million to a South American country, the company announced.

According to the contract, Tadiran will supply the country with its VHF and HF communication systems, which can be applied under the most hostile battle conditions.

Tadiran will also supply the country with a logistics package for training workers and keeping track of spare parts.

Amiram Raphael, Tadiran's marketing manager, said the company has recently increased its activities in South America.

New Terminal At Ben Gurion

JERUSALEM — The Airports Authority has chosen Bovis, the British-based international construction company, to provide management services for the new terminal at Ben-Gurion Airport, the authority announced.

The authority issued a statement saying Bovis, a giant firm with an international reputation and extensive know-how and experience in directing the construction of passenger terminals around the world, would assist it in directing the construction.

According to the tender, the company carrying out the project has to share the work with Israeli firms, authority director Motti Debi said.

Bovis' Israeli partners are Nitzan Inbar, which has 25 years of experience in construction, and AMN, which provides administrative services.

First PLO Bank in Ramallah

JERUSALEM — The Commercial Bank of Palestine opened in Ramallah recently making it the first Palestinian-owned bank in the territories.

At the opening ceremony, Palestinian Authority finance minister Mohammed Zohari Nashashibi said the bank should adopt a conservative management policy and avoid risk, since it will be holding the money of the masses and the local economy is not strong enough to take on risks.

Suhil Gidon, chairman of the bank's board, said that all the directors were local Palestinians and that the bank would specialize in the local economy and not on developing business relations with other countries.

The bank will give loans of every type to residents and is planning to expand throughout the territories.

Mondi expands Fall '94 line to include plus sizes

By ANITA SZABADI-GOTTESMAN
Special to The CJN

Mondi's beginnings were modest. Twenty-five years ago a group of European designers got together to launch a limited collection of innovative knitwear. The rest, as they say, is history.

Mondi is now sold in over 62 countries worldwide. Closer to home, Mondi boutiques are located in every major Canadian city including the prestigious Hazelton Lanes in Toronto and Ogilvy in Montreal. A loyal following of customers has embraced the Mondi Collection from season to season.

"Our customers call us for our catalogues before our collections reach the stores," says Jennifer Elliott, Director of Retail Stores for Mondi in Canada.

Knowing their clients and responding to their needs is the strength of Mondi. "We provide choices and options for our customers," stresses Elliott, "not just 'Here's the suit.' We have mix and match pieces that fit every woman's taste and figure."

Previously, the Mondi collections were only available in sizes four to 14, with not all collections available in 14. New for this year is the addition of size 16 in pants and skirts.

"We are responding to our customers' requests," Elliott points out, "by expanding our size range as well as accommodating the woman who may be a different size on the bottom than on the top."

Astute consumers will also note a major price decrease in the Mondi line. "Now every woman can feel she can afford to buy Mondi," beams Elliott. "Without compromising our top quality, we are making a conscious effort to enlarge our market by eliminating frustration as to size and price."

Tight quality control is another benchmark of Mondi. Manufactured in Germany and the Orient, Mondi ensures attention to detail from manufacturing through to shipping.

The Mondi name is synonymous with color. Greens, yellows, golds and oranges are paired with deep blues, greys and blacks. "And of course, red is always available at Mondi!" says Elliott.

This year "coffee brown is the new basic color instead of navy and grey," she adds. As well, the famous Italian Fabric and Yarn Fair forecasts that bordeaux is the biggest color for Fall.

Twelve designers from across Europe have designed collections this year, creating an international feel that is the signature of Mondi. The result is classic, elegant and functional clothing providing modern femininity for today's woman.

The Vive La Couleur collection presents cherry red and black. Bold colors plus gold incorporate the military look with gold buttons adorned with lions, crests and embroidery. Featured fabrics are poly-wools with soft velvet details.

The Images grouping takes the '70s inspiration all the way to a fresh and soft '90s femininity. Bordeaux and black wool and wool cashmere are featured in solids, checks and a fine pin-stripe. Highlights are velvet and gold with heraldry crests.

The Coffee Colors collection changes the mood to a very soft, clean feminine look. Coffee brown and cream in mix and match coordinates pairs beautifully with a silk blouse. This grouping features a new fabric from Japan — a polynosic microfibre that is soft and drapes beautifully.

New Country takes its inspiration from Europe's long equestrian history. Tied to the countryside with jodhpurs, suede finishing and sporty jackets, the look is now just as comfortable in the city. Shades of chocolate and gold are featured and various pieces combine beautifully with the Coffee Colors collection.

Mondi's club classic look of plaid with black, highlights of gold, cherry and royal. The heraldry motifs and crests celebrate their comeback as an irresistible eye-catcher.

"The best way to wear New Country is to layer, layer, layer," says Elliott. "The blouse, the vest, the jacket topped off with an overcoat."

Soft Details takes you out of the country and back to the city. The shaped woollen jacket is worn with a soft flowing gabardine pant or skirt. The colors of pine, cream and black are teamed with silver embroidery and buttons. Panne and crushed velvet provide the detail on these coordinates which can be combined for business or pleasure.

These collections are now available. Five others to complete the fall Mondi line will arrive in mid-October.

The right accessories can make or break even the most exquisite outfit.

So Mondi carries a full line of head-to-toe items. These include hats, earrings, necklaces, bracelets, pins, scarves, gloves, shoes, boots and handbags.

"Much of this year's jewelry collection is folklore-inspired, pulling from the Inca, Navaho and Scandinavian cultures," points out Elliott.

And not to be forgotten, the finishing touch to every outfit is Mondi's designer fragrance line, Pursence, which includes a complete line of perfume, soap and body cream.

If none of the Mondi line suits your tastes, the Portara collection will surely inspire you. This fashion-forward line is only available at Ogilvy in Montreal and Hazelton Lanes in Toronto.

The '70s influence comes through in five collections featuring an amazing selection of navy blue velvet, black and grey paired with cream, pale green and raspberry. Tie die effects, oversized chenille knitwear, men's influenced suits and leathers form the collection.

"While quite high-end," Elliott says, "the Portara collection has also seen a significant price decrease this season."

Finally, when it's time to dress a little more casually, the Braun collection provides high-end leisure wear. This exclusive line, again available only at Ogilvy and Hazelton Lanes, combines weekend wear such as jeans, trousers and polos with a complete summer Golf line. For fall and winter Braun carries marino wool cable sweaters and exquisite micro-fibre parkas and jackets.

Mondi, as its name suggests, is an entire world of fashion. The colors, style and feel ensure a truly international flavor to the world of Mondi.

'A diplomat's coat for the well-dressed man'

By RACHEL ALKALLAY
Special to The CJN

Outerwear is the specialty of Cardinal Clothes Canada, a private-label manufacturer which produces better outerwear for men and women.

Cardinal holds the exclusive rights to Joseph Abboud, an American designer based in New York, and the company has also produced coats for Ralph Lauren, Neiman-Marcus and Saks Fifth Avenue. The majority of their coats are sold in the United States — Cardinal has had an office in New York City since 1983 — with other major export markets being Europe and Japan.

All coats are produced at the company's St. Viateur Street factory.

Cardinal's big break came when they received their first order with Barney's in New York "after six months of hard work," recalls Jeffrey Ray, co-owner of the company with brother Michael. Once the quality of their workmanship was recognized by the major store, other stores jumped on the bandwagon.

To produce their fine line of coats, Ray works with the best Italian mills to create thousands of designs in natural fabrics.

Season's shades include the family of browns, especially rich chocolate brown and beiges; the deeper olives, which have made a strong comeback, with navy blue and charcoal gray remaining as staples. Tweeds and quiet plaids create a contrast in style choices.

Trim coats make an important statement. Beaver and mink collars are big items. Alpaca collars, with matching linings, present an elegant look. The velvet-collared coat, "a diplomat's coat for the well-dressed man," says Ray, sells well, particularly in the United States.

Ray maintains that soft construction and comfort have been the company's hallmark; current men's styles are catching up with the idea of comfort and easy wear. Soft shoulders, dropped shoulders, raglan shoulders in 22" shoulder widths, make up the majority of the season's coats: all in supple fabrics. The 48" - 50" length is standard.

Button-through coats, belted or unbelted, give stylish options. Slash pockets are on the rise; an elegant touch which provides ease of use.

Cashmere coats, alpaca and angora wools which are dyeable in every color, provide an excellent investment in outerwear. Cardinal uses coverts — covered cloth made in England — to produce some of its more elegant clothing.

On average, men buy coats every five years, which are expected to last for several seasons. Ray suggests that in making such an investment, the shopper should check out the coat's qualities.

The manufacturer should be a reputable one, and the store which carries the coat should be equally reliable. Check out the percentage of each fabric: a coat which states a wool/cashmere blend might be 95 per cent wool, and 5 per cent cashmere. Labelling is therefore important.

Lining should be of excellent quality (Cardinal uses only Bemberg and silk linings), with properly-finished seams. The lining should also be fully pressed and crease resistant. The Joseph Abboud line uses a lining the color of melted honey, which suits virtually every shade of coating.

In Canada, Cardinal outerwear is available through Harry Rosen, Holt Renfrew, Perry's Menswear and better men's shops.

A return to refined elegance marks this season's fashions for men, says Herschel Victor, president of Jack Victor, one of Canada's biggest manufacturers of classic menswear.

Men are now more fashion conscious, and the availability of fabrics and styles which allow men to be comfortable in suits is an important factor when fabrics are chosen for the season's line.

Today's natty dresser is looking for the best possible value in both fashion and fabric. Since men buy new suits on average every three years, quality has to be excellent to attract the buyer.

Victor recognizes this, since he learned much of the business working with father Jack Victor, who founded the company in 1913. It survived the tough days of the late '70s and early '80s, when many of the giants in the industry folded under pressure from the recession and competition from the Far East.

"It survived the endurance test," chuckles Victor, sitting comfortably in his office. The company employs 500 people, and manufactures solely at its Montreal factory. The emphasis on efficiency in production in North America has pushed the company to move to fully computerized machinery which is constantly updated.

It is a leader in classic fashions for men. Victor, as president of the Associated Clothing Manufacturers of Quebec, speaks with the authority born of decades of experience.

"Cuffs are the look of today," says Victor. "When I see a man wearing pants without cuffs, I know it's an old suit."

Looser clothing, softer lines, comfort are important for today's well-dressed man. Looser clothing is partially translated into pleated pants, a style which Victor says hides any corpulence around the waist.

Retailers are emphasizing fabric: excellent quality fabrics with suppleness and easy wearability. "Super 100's" is the new term coined by the industry to describe the fine quality of the yarn. Yarn quality is in turn determined by a high yarn count.

High performance fabrics, specially treated to make suits crease-resistant, are another distinguishing mark of quality. Quality fabrics distinguish the Jack Victor line: pure wools and the best worsteds imported from Europe.

Double-breasted blazers in navy blue or black are returning in a big way to the basic wardrobe. Beautiful buttons in gold, or gold and enamel, add a carefully elegant detail to the blazers. Charcoal trousers are out as the classic accessory to the blazer: tan has replaced the traditional favorite.

(A tip for 1995: tan, which has made a strong appearance in 1994, is the shade for next year. Tans, taupes, sand and beach shades are featured in suits or as separates.)

Double-breasted jackets as part of a suit are also on the way in. The Quebec market in particular favors the double-breasted look, while in the rest of Canada proportions are about 60 per cent single-breasted and 40 per cent double-breasted, says Victor.

Three-button jackets with buttons that blend in to the suit jacket are a feature which has appeared for a couple of years, and continues to be a feature in this season.

Jackets have soft stripes, thicker chalk stripes: stripes and quietly-worked patterns in tweeds . Lapels are wider — 3½" to 4".

The Jack Victor line is sold at 450 specialty shops and department stores in Canada, and over 300 shops in the United States.

Fun Fur Boutique provides quality garments

By RUTH SCHWEITZER
Special to The CJN

A woman strolled into a newly opened Yorkville area boutique specializing in faux fur jackets and coats recently, took one look at the "mink" coat on a hanger and was convinced it was the real thing.

When Sophia Flaumenbaum, one of the owners of the Fun Fur Boutique, told her it was a look-alike she refused to believe it at first.

The faux fur shimmers like mink, and design-wise, the coat is an accurate copy of the ones offered in fur salons around the city. Full length and double breasted, this classic straight-cut coat is truly elegant.

It's no wonder that the shopper did not want to believe Flaumenbaum — the "mink" certainly looks real enough.

The shop's large selection of beautiful jackets and coats in various styles are manufactured by the Flaumenbaum family in their factory at Dufferin and Steeles.

Stuart, Flaumenbaum's son, said the family went into the business of making faux fur outerwear in 1987, when faux fur arrived on the fashion scene, inspired by the animal rights movement. However, the low-end merchandise available at the time left a lot to be desired. We set out to improve the quality and tried to give it more style, said Stuart.

Up until the opening of the Fun Fur Boutique this past July, bits and pieces of the line were available in various stores, but no one retailer offered the entire collection.

Browsing through the bright shop, one can see that the Flaumenbaums have more than succeeded in bringing us high-quality faux fur jackets and coats.

The fabric they use, mod-acrylic, is a lot nicer than the name suggests. It is soft and luxurious, quite unlike the coarse and shaggy synthetic fabrics of the past that would send an animal lover running for wool.

Straight-cut and swing-style ¾ length jackets, which resemble fashionable Persian lamb or beaver, are available in basic colors — black and brown respectively. Attractive and understated abstract designs have been worked into the fabrics of the brown "beaver" jackets.

"Beaver" jackets come in an array of colors, including navy, green and eggplant, as well as various two-tone combinations. Some have black collars, others are trimmed with black at the collar and cuff. Prints include the dramatic black and white "dalmation" and cocktail paisley.

Swing style

Jackets feature winged, notch and shawl collars — some have extra-generous shawl collars — and a few have hoods. Pockets are hidden, and elegant rolled cuffs on some of the jackets make for a dressy look.

Full-length "beaver" swing and straight-cut coats with shawl collars, in brown only, are decorated with a braid pattern.

Sizing is in small, medium and large, with large swing styles fitting extra large.

How warm are they? Lined with cotton and silky acetate to help ward off winter's chill, the jackets and coats are "as warm as a real fur," Stuart said.

Prices are reasonable since the merchandise arrives at the shop on Bellair Avenue directly from the factory, and Stuart says he believes in passing on his savings to the consumer. Jackets start at $200 and coats, including the "mink," are $400.

"We're expecting to do very well," he said, "because we're the only store [in Toronto] that specializes in synthetic furs."

Stuart is already planning to expand his retail operations, "if this one works well."

The manufacturing side of the Flaumenbaum family business, Fun Fur Inc., has grown steadily since the company was founded in '87. They began exporting to the United States in 1990, and recently the company captured the Japanese, Korean and Hong Kong markets, where Stuart says there is a big demand for his faux fur outerwear. In fact, business has been so good that last year the factory moved to larger premises.

He said his prices are "very reasonable" compared to those in many other parts of the world, especially European countries. As manufacturing costs in Europe are much higher than ours, he says he could double his wholesale price there.

Next year Fun Fur Inc. plans to venture into the European market.

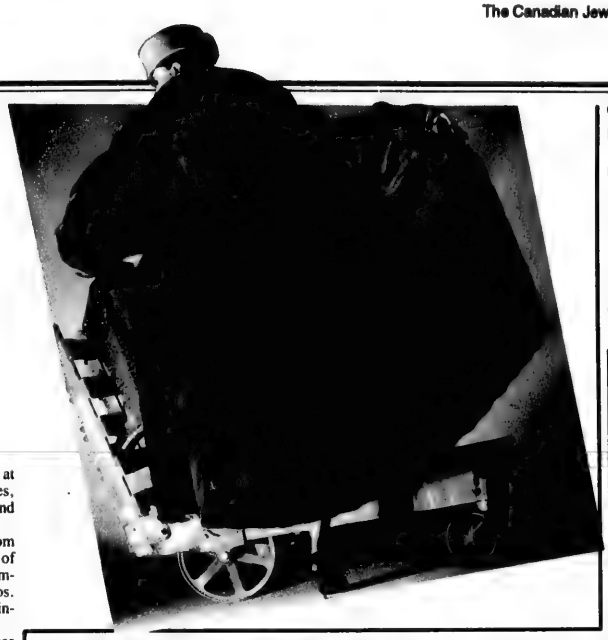
Natural Furs: fun elegant

By RACHEL ALKALLAY
Special to The CJN



Fantastic frills.
Fashionable Fendi.
Fabulous fur.
Natural Furs.

Fur is back, with the accent on luxury.

Natural Furs, one of the leaders in the industry, is at the forefront of the return of fur to women's wardrobes, creating beautiful furs for both the North American and the export markets.

Barbara Gilleck, whose father built Natural Furs from a small retail shop in Jonquiere to one of the giants of the fur business today, has continued to work in the company after its sale last year to Tom and Gwen Naccos.

Fur is in the blood; she grew up surrounded by the industry and understands its often fickle nature.

Gilleck explains that because of the recent hard times experienced in the fur industry, which closed down many fur suppliers, and the upswing in popularity of beautiful natural furs, prices have risen considerably.

With fewer ranches from which to choose, the market for top-quality pelts has become more competitive. The business is also cyclical in nature, says Gilleck, and the cycle is now favorable to buying exciting furs.

Natural Furs creates the elegant furs for Fendi and Native Canadian designer D'Arcy Moses, an innovative young designer who is making his creative mark in the industry.

Capes are big this year, says Gilleck. Whether the fur is used as as trim for a fabric cape, or the cape is made entirely of fur, the look is a classic with a touch of panache.

Fendi-designed coats sport chess figurines in brightly-hued reds, yellows and blues. Matching pompon frills add to the fun look of this season's furs. Green mink is marked with blue Xs on the pockets.

Long, full-length coats and deliciously luxurious wraps of mink and sable are all lined in pure silk, naturally.

The European market is dressier than the North American one, says Gilleck. A European woman is more likely to have several fur pieces suitable for different occasions to match her lifestyle: stricter dressing for cocktails, after five, evening wear. Europeans dress up to attend the theatre or the opera.

Natural Furs has designed fur suits of jackets and skirts for top European designer shows, answering the demand in the European market for the ultimate in elegant suits.

North Americans' more casual lifestyle lends itself to simpler dressing. This is reflected in fur, where a woman will own one fur coat which she will use for most occasions.

While furs are available in every color under the sun, earth tones remain a staple of the industry. Explains Gilleck: "When a woman buys one fur coat, it is meant to last for several seasons. A rich brown mink will always look good and be in style."

Fabulous alternatives exist to make the mink — and other furs as well — more versatile. Natural Furs has created reversible fur coats; coats with removable collars; coats with removable linings. One coat can therefore be dressed up or dressed down.

Fur accessories — scarves and hats worn with style as in the movie Dr. Zhivago, are making a comeback. Despite a more casual lifestyle, when buying fur, women want a rich and elegant look. Fur gives it to them.

Sheared beaver coats, soft Russian sable, lavish chinchilla, silky nutria, are the ultimate in luxury coats. Canadian lynx jackets, dotted with honey-colored spots, are the perfect outdoor wear for casual winter fun.

Natural Furs warehouses 10,000 coats throughout the year, and its stockroom is a delight of velvety coats, capes and jackets in a rainbow of hues.

Fur — fun, fabled, fabulous.

Deux par Deux took the gold in the Quebec designer category for children's fashions for the second time. There youngsters, pictured above, clearly illustrade that the award was rightly given.

Award-winning looks from Deux par Deux

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Special to The CJN

Deux par Deux took the gold again last spring, winning the Griffe d'or (gold label award) in the Quebec designer category for children's fashion for the second time.

The annual prize bestowed on those in the Quebec fashion industry was awarded to Deux par Deux based on about ten criteria ranging from originality to product marketing to product quality and price-quality ratio.

Launched in 1986 by Maurice Elmaleh and Claude Diwan, the collection is a combination of exuberance and excitement. Exclusive prints, broad and comfortable lines which give children full freedom of movement, sensitivity to client's needs and product diversity all add to the company's success.

The made-in-Quebec, mostly 100 per cent cotton collection can outfit children from birth to 10 years in everything from outerwear, pants and shirts to co-ordinates.

Elmaleh says, "When we first brought out our clothes, designed by Francoise Toulotte and Claude Diwan, we were a little bit crazy and the retailers were surprised, but the customers recognized the quality as well as the provocation and humor and they were very positive.

"We were the first to bring out larger shapes such as jumpsuits and everything was possible in terms of creativity. Now, however we have had to adapt to the recession and although we are still very fashionable we have placed more effort on pricing."

Everything in the Deux par Deux collection is coordinated by stories and groups. "Prints are created on our own drawing boards so you will not see our fabric anywhere else. Our designs have personality — we put all our heart, soul and sense of creativity into our work, and because of this our retailers and customers follow us," says Elmaleh.

Boys and girls alike will revel in the red, white and blue nautical grouping featuring broad-striped, hooded winter jackets trimmed with a bright red pocket and plaid cuffs and paired with a red and blue checked tuque, or the red, white and blue over-vest, worn over a bulky white sweatshirt. Striped overalls with red straps and cuffs are perfect for the toddler.

Dresses, coats and jackets in the feminine, peach-tone grouping are adorned with roses and little girls' faces. The coat, in a cotton-wool blend is solid peach, with brown fake-fur trimmed hood. The double-cuffs of rose print and brown fur add extra warmth to the already cozy coat.

A delightful brown and mocha striped collection features a sleeveless vest that can be paired with an almost knee-length flounced skirt, printed leggings or corduroy pants trimmed with printed cuffs.

Deux par Deux is available in many stores across Canada, as well as about having 200 points of sale in the United States. As a result of granting licence agreements to European manufacturers in order to produce the line, Deux par Deux is penetrating that continent and the Middle East.

A versatile Versace!

By RACHEL ALKALLAY
Special to The CJN

Silver boots and soft black leather jackets are the dramatic statements created by Gianni Versace for the 1994 autumn line.

As modeled by Claudia Schiffer, the look emphasizes lean, slim clothing in exquisitely original fabric treatments.

Avant-garde jacket treatments, a Versace specialty, mark the line, offering jackets in metallic silver or the softest nappa leather. Versace designs with Italian flair feature shorter jackets worn over big bulky sweaters of silver or big knits of the softest wool.

Short skirts are important; knee-length or well above the knee, they are designed to be shortened or lengthened according to individual taste.

The shorter the skirt, the lengthier the boot — Versace's boots are elegant masterpieces of suede with silver trimmings, big buckles. Lace-up boots come in shorter and longer lengths and are easily matched to Versace suits.

Suedes in the softest baby blue or pastel pink — pastels are major in this season's palette — are easily matched to boucle suits to make solid one-color statements, contrasted with blouses of flowing silk in wild prints mixing and matching floral themes with naval symbols.

Waists are high, often accessorized with a big belt to emphasize the high-waisted look.

Long gowns in gold leather, baring the shoulders, curve in at the waist for evening wear.

Suits are important this season — perfect for the Canadian market which loves buying pieces to mix, rather than less versatile one-piece outfits.

Jackets do well in Canada, and Versace has filled his collection with jackets with noticeable collars — notched and lying flat, notched and softly raised around the neck, contrasting black against red leather.

Accessories are a strong element of the Versace line, and this autumn's styles are no exception. The silver theme continues to dominate, as gold recedes into the background in belts. Silver chains and safety pins, in belts or jackets, continue the strong statement from last year. And while the concept remains in the women's line, the men's line has also adopted the look.

Versace continues with his versatility by offering a total match of clothing from A to Z.

The woman who wears Versace is meant to be noticed, and noticed she is, in fabulously plasticized clothing in shimmering shades. Reds. Soft yellows. Palest of pinks. Leggy looks accented by the fabric. Fitted at the bust. Attention to the waist. Roomy at the hip line.

The '60s look is updated for today and worn by women of fashion of all ages.

And Versace classics fill a need for the client who wants to update an older skirt from a different catalogue.

The Versace line is available at the newly-opened Versace boutique in the Alcan Building, 1260 Sherbrooke St. West.

Springing towards 1995!

"Fashion meets contrasts" is the leitmotif of the spring/summer 1995 fashion summer and were seen in the new fashion trends at ModaBerlin.

New contrasts that create new harmonies determine the image of fashion. Not only by colors, fabrics and silhouettes but also by an exciting and creative mix of coordinates.

REDUCED IDEA

Purity is the symbol of this new trend which puts every shade of white in the limelight. Fresh in linen and cotton, mixed with viscose and cambrics.

Neatly structured in piqué, honeycomb, cotton gauze, net, à jour fabrics, and jersey in relief, as well as in ribbed and plaited patterns.

Line and detail are minimized in order to create a clean image of the fabrics. Basics determine the trend, the white T-shirt sees a revival. Jackets are mainly short, in blazer and fitted style. Coats are short and white. Dresses come in shirt, tent and underskirt style, short and long.

Trousers are tubular and soft. Waistcoats with varying hemlines, short tops, camisoles, bodies and ribbed pullovers with short sleeves.

GENTLE IDEA

Angelic, fragile, esoteric and etheral, these are the key words characterising this fashion theme for summer 95. The color scale is delicate and gentle ranging from the blue of the air and sky, mauve of blossom, the green of spring and a variety of gentle shades of skin.

Transparency dominates the fabrics like tulle, organdy, chiffon or nylon teamed with fluid silks, satins, opaque and shiny viscose, printed with soft and romantic flowers in a rustic and antique style.

The styling is predominantly Botticelli and nymph-like. Empire, layer and lingerie look. For decoration we find laces, hooks and eyes.

ARTISAN IDEA

Ethnic influences from Africa and Asia underline the colonial, exotic, primitive and symbolic origin.

In Asian blue, khaki green, beige with brown, curry, oxblood and Indian red, everything slightly faded and worn, whether in cotton, silk, satin, voile, embroidered macramés or madras.

Preferred designs: multi-colored stripes, tie-dye, ikat, batik, exotic floral motifs, Indian style prints and Kashmiri pattrerns.

Ethnic influences determine the contrast styling: maharini and bush jackets, city pareos and safari sarongs, Sarouel and Indian trousers.

SPEEDY IDEA

Multi-cultural and cosmopolitan, urban, dynamic, architectural and sporty. In this trend city and street wear meet in contrast.

Qualities are cool wool, cotton with acetate and viscose, hi-tech fabrics, stretch satin, nylon and net.

Trendy colors: white, blue, black, red, fluorescent turquoise, pink, orange and green.

Activewear greatly influences the stylings. Tank tops worn over tennis polos, jogging pants, wind-cheaters mixed with the schoolgirl look and punk power à la Mick Jagger. Skirts in mini, trapeze and kilt style.

Fall Fashion

Take a good look at Heaslip Headwear

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Special to The CJN

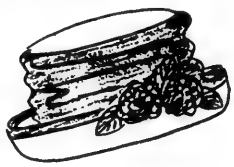
Fall styling at Heaslip Headwear, manufacturers of ladies hats and complementary accessories, swings from casual to sophisticated, mostly in soft shapes and unstructured bodies.

Established in 1945 and owned since 1986 by Robert and Elaine Siegel, Heaslip manufactures under the classic Heaslip Headwear label and the trendier Vicki Sather label.

This season's creations by Vicki Sather create a mood of elegance and romance with colors ranging from rich jewel tones of crimson red, hunter green to navy, chocolate and black. The velvet line is trimmed with rich velvet flowers and has leaves cascading from swirled and draped crowns and ruffled and pleated brims. The melton and velvet ribbon grouping features hats with velvet bound brims and velvet bows adorning the crowns. The large brimmed Audrey is trimmed with a band of velvet and a double bow at the back of the crown, while the bucket and pansy sport three bows in the front.

Sather's fringed melton group of hats are trimmed in a three-colored varigated fringe which matches the color of the melton while the chenille-trimmed suede line takes suede hats to a new level by draping crowns and pleating brims. The brims are trimmed with a chenille and rayon braid to match the suede.

Designer Slav Maglov has created silhouettes for this season's hats that are fashionable, yet functional. Styles range from draped crowns, close fitting cloches to large, face framing brims. Colors are deep rich shades of burgandy, hunter, chocolate, vicuna, navy and eggplant. Soft washed shades include plum, tobacco, brown, taupe and oatmeal.



The ribless cord group is made up of warm earthtones of celery, cactus, camel, cafe, expresso as well as teal and black cord. Styles have draped crown or pleated brims and are trimmed with black velvet roses and bows or a whimsical ribbon carnation arrangement in a complementary color. A strong Russian influence is evident in the chunky Persian lamb look, with fur brimmed draped cloches to softly draped Breton styles in rich tones of black and muted brown.

Heaslip hats are available in Canada as well as several major American department stores and specialty chains. It anticipates further penetration into the U.S. market as well as Mexico.

Beautiful Autumn Face

By CAROL WISE
Special to The CJN

Autumn, in my opinion, is the most beautiful time of the year.

Blazing leaves and cool crisp mornings are all sure signs that the season has arrived. With the glorious summer months behind us, thinking about the long cold winter is not the most fun thought we can have, but you know what they say, reality bites.

Its time to pay close attention to your makeup and most importantly your skin care regime.

Over the summer we all tend to get a little lazy, so the first thing you want to do is have a professional facial. If your budget does not allow for that, then do an at home facial scrub. There are many good products on the market. This treatment will not only improve your skin tone but, will give you that overall look of freshness.

Use your moisturizer twice a day and don't forget your eye cream. Whether you are male or female my advice is to take a little extra time and make your skin look like you are proud of it.

Beauty most definitely comes from within, be sure your outer body reflects what is going on inside. I know life can become very stressful, relaxation tapes can be very helpful in keeping your facial muscles relaxed. Stress can really play havoc with your skin.

Makeup for the fall months will be well defined, yet, sultry. Soft muted colors will be most popular, with lips being your main focal point once again.

Foundation that is relatively light in texture will be most effective. Choose a shade that is closest to your natural skin tone and be sure to blend well. Cover-up will be your best friend during the fall season. As your glow from the summer sun fades your dark circles under your eyes will become more apparent. Choose a thickly formulated cream, apply under your eyes, using a pat, blend motion.

Most popular eye shadow shades this season will be butterscotch, sand, brown and celery. Apply your lightest shade under your brow, a medium shade on your lid and a dark shade in the crease of your eye. Blend all shadows well, there should be no demarcation lines. Eye shadow should enhance the color of your eyes, making them appear brighter.

Kohl pencils applied close to your lash line will add definition and width to your eye. Your best color choices here are chocolate, taupe, grey and black. Eyeliner, applied on your top lid only, can be most dramatic but probably most appropriate for one of your special evenings out.

Mascara, should be thick in texture, but, should not look clumpy once applied. Your only color choices here are definitely either black or brown. I have never seen anyone with navy eyelashes, have you? If you have a hard time applying your mascara evenly, then have a dry brush on hand to help separate your lashes.

Brows are also important, they should be well shaped and well defined. Choose an eyebrow pencil in a similar color to your hair. Pencil in your natural brow and then brush up with a brow brush.

Lipstick colors will vary from natural tones to deep red. Your lips should be full and sensuous, but don't get carried away, you want to keep them looking natural and kissable. Too much lipstick can be totally offensive looking. Lip pencil in a similar color to your lipstick will give you the definition you are looking for without overdoing it.

Enjoy these helpful hints and enjoy the beauty of autumn.

Citywear: Relaxed ..yet.. elegant

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Special to The CJN

With the appointment of Andy The-Anh to design its womenswear collection, Irving Samuel Canada Inc. is giving its line a new orientation while retaining its 50-year-strong tradition of excellence.

The-Anh, born in Viet Nam in 1965, studied fashion design in Montreal and was the recipient of the 1988 Dubonnet award for menswear as well as the Jeune Designer du Quebec award. In Quebec he is known for his personal creations, notably those he designs for Quebec singer Mitsou.

Coming up for fall at Irving Samuel is citywear that is elegant, yet relaxed and thoroughly modern. Shapes are long and lean, always feminine with smaller shoulders and skimmed waists. Wool, soft and textured in deep and rich colors is the fabric of choice.

The black and stone grouping, known for its Oriental detailing such as Mao collars and subdued embroidery, features the black and stone theme on tweedy wools with leather and velvet trims added for a rustic/refined look.

Long pants with unpressed pleats, long, rounded-shaped single and double-breasted jackets, simple and neat short skirts and straight-cut blouses with pointed cuffs and embroidered collars form an important part of the grouping. A classic blazer is revamped with a Mao or shawl collar and a casual velvet outfit features jean-style pants and a leather-trimmed jacket.

For a look that will take a woman from the boardroom to dinner, The-Anh has created the navy and vicuna group featuring easy pants and short skirts matched with long vests and collarless or shawl collared jackets.

Patterns include a plaid check on a navy and vicuna herringbone background, large pale yellow checks, a false solid with a mini-herringbone effect or a true solid with a herringbone texture. Suede trimmings add elegance.

For a look that spells countryside comfort, Irving Samuel is showing unstructured straight shapes influenced by horseback riding gear. A long, softly tailored, belted shirt-jacket in large, colorful checks in red, beige, mustard and black or khaki, kelly green, powder blue and black variations is paired with leather trimmed jodhpurs.

Outerwear is not forgotten this season and coats are warm, comfortable and luxurious. Styles include a group of kimono shapes detailed with subtle embroideries, tassels and braid closures; long, oversize duster coats detailed with leather, and double-breasted styles with multiple buttons for a military look.

The line features many fabrics, including angora, alpaca, baby alpaca and velvet — plus the Irving Samuel classic wool/cashmere blend. Novelty fabrics include ribbed wool and herringbone grounds.

The in-between colors are deep with a red hovering between eggplant and burgundy and a green that is neither kelly nor forest. Also important are khaki, deep red and stone.

Parkhurst's fall line-up features different styles, colors

By RUTH SCHWEITZER
Special to The CJN

Women are wearing hats again and the business of making them has grown substantially, according to a merchandise manager at Parkhurst, a leading Canadian manufacturer of hats.

The company, which has been producing fashion knitwear and accessories for more than 60 years, is so busy that they are building a new mill around the corner from the current one in the Eglinton/Laird area of Toronto, said Philippa Madigan.

Parkhurst's fall and winter hat collection includes more than a hundred different styles in a rainbow of colors. The core of their hat business is the beret, still the most popular woman's hat by far, according to Madigan. But Parkhurst designers have created quite a few variations on the basic beret.

They have updated the beret by adding brims, faux fur, lacework, velvet and buttons. Many styles are available in cotton too. "Cotton is really taking off for fall," said Madigan, adding that the hats are warm.

The wool, unfelted beret, has caught the eye of buyers from a couple of the largest U.S. department stores, she says. This beret, which has a knit look, is as soft as cotton.

Close-fitting hats are the rage. In other years the large beret dominated, but Parkhurst has received orders from stores throughout North America for small and medium-sized berets this year, noted Madigan. Their wool rolled hat, which has a tight roll of fabric at its base, fits close to the head like a '20s-style cloche.

Among the brimmed styles, the floppy moppet hat is a Parkhurst bestseller. Available in wool and cotton, the moppet fits loosely around the head as do the many other brimmed styles.

Variations on the fez, in cotton and wool felt, are featured in the collection as well as elegant pillbox hats.

There is a cheerful multi-colored cotton blend hat, in fez and toque styles, that has been inspired by traditional Icelandic accessories. Matching scarves and gloves are available. "This whole group has done very well," said Madigan. "It's for someone who doesn't want just a plain hat."

Scarves are getting wider and the shawl, which disappeared a couple of seasons ago, is making a comeback. Madigan predicted that women will be wearing shawls over sweaters this fall.

Fingerless gloves and leg warmers — another accessory that Parkhurst has rescued from oblivion — in combination with casual wear are the perfect accessories to create the fashionable rustic look.

This country look can be enhanced with sleeve extensions, which are similar to leg warmers but worn on the arms, said Madigan. Sleeve extensions are one hot fall item that is not in the Parkhurst collection. For everyday wear, Parkhurst makes regular, medium, long and fur-trimmed gloves.

Color-wise, shades of browns are big this year, according to Madigan. Most Parkhurst hats, scarves and gloves come in a wide selection of colors, among them black, natural (ivory), red, navy, tartan (green), burgundy, russet (warm brown), teal, thistle (purple) and twilight (dark blue). Shawls are available in basic colors only.

Since the average price for a hat is $20, Madigan says they make inexpensive accessories. Many of the hats retail in the $20 to $30 range, while the basic beret costs less. Gloves are about $15, scarves $15 to $25, and shawls $75 to $100. Parkhurst continues to manufacture luxurious peaked caps, berets, gloves, scarves and mitts made of 70 per cent angora in various colors and prints, which retail at slightly higher prices.

Parkhurst accessories are available in Canada at many locations including: Boutique San Francisco, Club Monaco, Eaton's, Fairweather, The Gap, Laura Shops. In the United States: Lord & Taylor, Macy's, I. Magnin.

Wayne Clark means sexy short, feminine designs

By RUTH SCHWEITZER
Special to The CJN

Feminine, sexy and short — especially short — these are the major trends in fall evening wear, according to leading Canadian designer Wayne Clark.

Women are less likely to buy a full-length gown these days, and instead, they are opting for shorter skirt lengths — from just above the knee to thigh-revealing minis.

Clark, who has been specializing in evening wear for the past two years, said sales of his short dresses and skirts at Holt Renfrew, one of the retailers that sells his collection, have been brisk.

In his fall evening collection, Clark has responded to the demand for shorter skirt lengths by featuring a silky georgette cocktail dress in purple, black, sage and scarlet. With its swing skirt and horizontal "rouche" pleating from the waist up, this fabulous dress exudes a playful and perky sexuality. Clark has combined sheer cap sleeves with traditional strapless-dress styling, which in this particular dress adds a note of demureness. The sleeves can be worn full or folded onto the shoulder for a strap effect.

It's pretty and feminine, like a ballerina's rehearsal dress, said Clark. An Empire-waisted "baby doll" version of the ballerina dress with a fuller skirt is available.

Clark's collection of cocktail dresses will certainly appeal to the sophisticated shopper, especially the sleek Empire-waisted dress — a georgette dress that shares some similarities with the ballerina dress. The bodice is horizontally pleated, but the skirt with diagonal "fortuny" pleating lightly and comfortably hugs the body. Available with sheer cap sleeves or strapless, it comes in the same colors as the ballerina dress.

Clark's holiday collection includes a spectacular line of separates made of velvet and georgette, lovely velvet dresses and a charming taffeta skirt with a crinoline underneath for fullness.

Velvet will be as strong as ever, Clark says, if not stronger.

Velvet and georgette in combination play a prominent role in his holiday collection. On one of his buying trips to New York, he found a georgette decorated with floral velvet prints. He designed a line of separates for Holt Renfrew with the fabric, among them a tank top, a kimona and a blouse. On another trip, he found georgette decorated with abstract pebbly shapes made of velvet or, as he calls them, "flintstones." The store preferred the abstract pattern, so Clark used the fabric to create a line of separates and dresses, including a spaghetti-strap gown and a slip dress.

Clark, a graduate of the Sheridan College fashion program, has been active in the Canadian fashion industry for 20 years.

When he opened his own business, he decided to go into evening wear exclusively first because of his reputation for evening wear designs and second because he believed that no one was willing to pay full price for anything but evening wear in the midst of a recession. He also reflected on his own shopping habits. "I looked at the way I was buying clothes. The only time I was being extravagant was all of a sudden a special occasion would come up and I would go out and treat myself," he said.

Clark's instincts have proven to be correct. Business, he replied, is "just terrific."

Wayne Clark merchandise is available at: Camari, Holt Renfrew, Joy Cherry, Original Imports, Zenobia and Zoe Christo.

Jews take PQ win in stride

Popular vote encourages federalists

By JANICE ARNOLD
CJN Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — After being resigned for months to a Parti Quebecois (PQ) victory — and after being told by polls throughout the campaign that it would be a big one — Montreal Jews woke up the day after the Quebec election feeling unexpectedly optimistic.

Community leaders insist the mood in no way resembles that of 1976, when the PQ was elected for the first time and many Jews were gripped with a fear of the unknown. They are confident the community has forged enough links with the PQ since then to ensure that the community's vast array of health, social and educational institutions that partially depend on public funding are in no danger.

None see the election and the launch of the referendum as sparking an out-migration of Jews as in the late '70s.

"The community is taking a wait-and-see attitude," said Jack Jedwab, community relations director of Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC). "No one is rushing to do anything at this moment."

The fact that the popular vote for the PQ and the Liberals was almost equal at 44 per cent (the spread was only 15,325 votes) is encouraging for federalists. But Jedwab does not underestimate the power of a determined Premier Jacques Parizeau, with the help of Bloc Quebecois leader Lucien Bouchard in Ottawa, to gather support for sovereignty as a referendum approaches. Nor does he discount the "volatility" of the electorate.

Riding results see page 5

CJC will take an active federalist stance in the campaign, he said, but it is not certain at this time whether it will form a coalition with the Greek and Italian communities as it did to support a Yes in the 1992 constitutional referendum on acceptance of the Charlottetown Accord.

Jedwab is not afraid that high-profile Jewish opposition to sovereignty will harm the community's relations with the government. "It is incumbent upon the Parizeau government to address the needs of all Quebecers irrespective of their position in this debate."

The goal of CJC's involvement in the campaign will be to convince the population that it is "in the best interest of all Quebecers" to reject sovereignty, he said.

"Calm" is the word Federation CJA executive vice-president Steven Drysdale used to describe the community. He noted that the day before the election, the CJA's big Super Sunday telethon, he heard almost no mention of politics among the hundreds of volunteers.

Most Jews see the election as expressing above all a desire to change governments and not a vote for separation, he believes.

WJC issues terrorism alert

Jewish Telegraphic Agency

NEW YORK — In the wake of a threatened terrorist attack against the German Jewish community, the World Jewish Congress (WJC) has issued an alert to its offices around the world to be on guard against potential terrorist acts.

The threat that the Abu Nidal terrorist cell would attack in Germany included a specific day — Sept. 25 — and a specific target — Ignatz Bubis, head of the German Jewish community, according to Elan Steinberg, WJC executive director.

Steinberg said WJC was alerted last Friday by both Israeli and German authorities about the threat in Germany.

"The German Jewish leadership from Bubis on down was made aware of what the German government officials described as concrete threats," Steinberg said.

Both the German Security Service and the German Interior Ministry have confirmed that Abu Nidal activists have entered Germany and are preparing terrorist attacks against Jewish and Israeli targets.

"The nature of the threat is such that there was even an indication of a specific date, Sept. 25 [this Sunday]," Steinberg said.

"While the specific information related to Germany, it did not necessarily mean that other targets in other places were exempt," he added.

As result, he said, "we sent an urgent fax to all WJC regional offices around the world alerting them to the information, and providing whatever details we had to take whatever precautions they could."

Canadian Jewish Congress, effectively the WJC's arm in this country, is aware of the WJC directive, said CJC spokesman Mike Cohen on Monday.

But Cohen said no new precautions will be taken across Canada, as beefed-up security measures implemented before the High Holidays and following the attacks this summer on Jewish institutions in Buenos Aires and London remain in place.

"We don't wait for new threats," Cohen said. "This [security] is something we do 12 months a year."

Steinberg said the attacks in Germany were being traced to the so-called Abu Nidal group.

Abu Nidal is the nomme de guerre of Sabri al-Banna, a rejectionist Palestinian whose group has been accused of masterminding various murderous attacks, such as those on the Vienna and Rome airports in 1985 and on an Istanbul synagogue in 1986.

Abu Nidal had strong connections with the Stasi, the former East Germany's feared secret service. The organization is believed to be taking advantage of its past connections for its preparations of further attacks inside Germany.

The warning in Germany was extended to Jewish leaders, businesses and community centres, and has prompted stepped up security at Jewish sites around the country.

German authorities posted armored personnel carriers at Jewish and Israeli institutions in Bonn and Berlin.

For over a week, police in bulletproof vests carrying automatic weapons have been posted along the Kurfurstendamm, Berlin's main shopping boulevard, where Jewish-owned businesses are located.

Police have been doing random checks of people entering stores and parking lots, according to reports.

Police are also guarding Berlin's Oranienstrasse synagogue, recently reopened after extensive renovations.

In Bonn, police closed off the streets on which the Israeli Embassy and Jewish community centre are located.

Steinberg said there were no known threats to Jewish communities elsewhere but that precautions are being taken.

German officials publicized the threat from the Abu Nidal group about three weeks ago, and it made headlines in the German media.

Bubis told a youth gathering in Dortmund, in central Germany, over the weekend that he believed the planned terrorist attacks were intended to disrupt the Mideast peace process.

He said he was not concerned about his safety and had not stepped up his personal security in the wake of the threats.

However, German police have, at their own initiative, intensified their guarding of Bubis over the past two months.

Bubis, chairman of the Central Council of Jews in Germany, is a well-known figure in Germany and has been outspoken against the neo-Nazi danger to the Jews in Germany.

The latest threats come just months after reports that Abu Nidal had smuggled four activists into Germany to carry out attacks against Israeli targets there.

According to the weekly newsmagazine Der Spiegel, Abu Nidal was planning the attacks in conjunction with the Islamic fundamentalist Hezbollah to avenge the kidnapping of a Hezbollah leader from eastern Lebanon in May.

Israel had kidnapped — and is still holding — Shi'ite Muslim leader Mustafa Dirani with the hope that he would shed light on the whereabouts of missing Israeli airman Ron Arad.

Last week, German officials arrested seven men in Berlin said to be of Arab origin, but released them the following day because of insufficient evidence.

It was a busy Yom Kippur

Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM — Over 100 children were injured in bicycle and skateboard accidents, 82 people fainted, and 92 babies were born during this year's Yom Kippur fast, which was otherwise mostly uneventful.

The streets of Jerusalem were filled last Wednesday night and Thursday with people on their way to pray at synagogues and at the Western Wall.

The traditional quiet in the capital was preserved, with few cars on streets. Police said beefed-up forces secured the paths leading to the Western Wall and the plaza itself.

Eighty-two persons reportedly fainted from fasting.

In Jerusalem, 92 women gave birth to Yom Kippur babies, four of them delivered at home or in ambulances on the way to the hospital.

Super Sunday sets new record

$2.6 million pledged in just 12 hours

TORONTO — This year's Super Sunday telethon set a one-day fundraising record: $2.6 million pledged in just 12 hours.

The figure is $200,000 more than was raised at last year's Super Sunday.

The telephone blitz helped kick off the 1995 United Jewish Appeal campaign, whose goal is $40 million.

Super Sunday chair Roz Davidson attributed the improved results to a better economy, well trained canvassers (some 700 of them, using over 150 telephones) and a reliable corps of contributors.

A total of 40,000 calls were made, reaching 20,000 households. The telethon is the largest fundraising event in Toronto.

Roughly 5,000 donations were pledged, each averaging $525.

Russian-speaking canvassers targeted some 600 Russian Jewish immigrants in Toronto.

The oldest volunteer was Irving Green, 95. The youngest was 6-year-old Sheera Kendal, who volunteered for the second straight year.

"UJA donors don't need to be sold on the cause," Davidson noted. "They have already demonstrated their commitment. Super Sunday reminds them of Jewish needs, and they respond generously."

This is the bar mitzvah year for Super Sunday. The first canvassing marathon netted $100,000.

This year, Super Sunday was followed by Super Week telethons every night, and by Federation Sunday on Sept. 18, during which those involved with community organizations volunteered their time.

Contributions to UJA finance education and social services in Toronto. As well, half of all funds raised go to Israel.

The theme of the 1995 UJA drive, co-chaired by Wendy Eisen and Bob Masters, is Saving Jewish Lives.

Volunteer canvassers at Super Sunday work the telephones. Another blitz last Sunday netted an additional $500,000 in pledges. Calls were also made all last week, bringing a total of $4 million in pledges. [Ron Csillag photo]

UJA Women dine and donate

$500,000 pledged

By AMY SATTIN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — They came, they dined, they donated.

Kisses flew through the air at society hostess Marsha Bronfman's Forest Hill home, as 147 women gathered there last Monday for a garden lunch.

Then, after dining on poached salmon and dilled potato salad, they pushed back their gilt chairs and pledged $500,000 towards the United Jewish Appeal's $40-million fundraising campaign. Power lunching indeed.

The women are part of the 230-strong Lion of Judah and Atarah Women's Campaign divisions, which plan to canvass another $1.5 million this year. The divisions raised $2.8 million last year.

A Lion of Judah pledges at least $5,000, with Atarah donors pledging $10,000 and up.

Mingling under sunny skies, many of the women sported golden Lion of Judah pins on their lapels.

"I try and wear mine whenever I can," said Atarah division co-chair Carole Herman Zucker. She most recently wore the pin to Rosh Hashanah services at Holy Blossom Temple. "I told people I saw in line, 'You should be wearing this, too.' " She said at least one woman at the luncheon took up the challenge.

A lot more have taken up that challenge in the 10 years since a Lion of Judah division was started in Toronto. What began with 61 women soon grew to 175 members, and spawned the sister Atarah division in 1989.

The pioneering members were honored at the luncheon, the role call a who's who of Jewish society: Hendeles, Koschitzky, Koffler, Lunenfeld, Posluns, Solomon, Tanenbaum, Wolfe.

Their donations match their stature. CJA women's division chair Barbara Bank, herself a Lion of Judah, said three women have pledged over $100,000 each, with 10 more pledging over $25,000 and another 18 pledging $15,000 or more. The two divisions last year accounted for 60 per cent of women's donations, she said.

"These are women of financial means who believe in giving to others, in giving tzedakah," she told The CJN. "They are [fulfilling] their responsibilities to the Jewish community here and in Israel."

Guest speaker Carole Solomon of Philadelphia took it one step further. "You are the philanthropic role models for the Toronto Jewish community," the UJA national women's division chair told her fellow Lions of Judah. "We strive for a finer quality of life, not only for ourselves, but for others."

The division began in Miami in 1972. There are approximately 7,000 Lions in America and 700 across Canada.

Rock outlines reasons behind handling of Grujicic case

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — A meeting last week of the lawyers' division of the United Jewish Appeal got early word of the decision to stay charges against accused war criminal Radislav Grujicic, and they got it right from the minister himself.

Justice Minister Allan Rock told about 120 lawyers attending the evening assembly that he decided around noon the same day to stay the charges because of Grujicic's physical condition. Over the summer, the 83-year-old murder suspect had his leg amputated, suffered a heart attack and did not have the mental faculties to instruct counsel, Rock said.

With a poor prognosis ahead, the decision was made to end the prosecution. "I felt we had done everything possible to proceed," Rock said.

The minister, who has held the post since 1993, said he viewed the prosecution of war criminals as a "priority" item. Since last March, he has reviewed a batch of 18 "priority cases" that involve serious allegations.

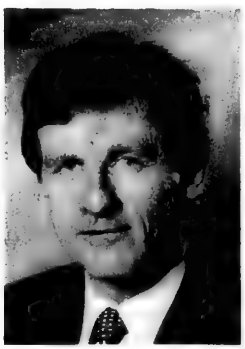
"I have been singularly impressed with the research and the depth of analysis" by the department's war crimes unit. "The briefs are extremely thorough and elaborate," he said.

The recent Supreme Court of Canada decision in the Imre Finta case has been a factor in his decisions on whether to recommend criminal prosecution or alternative remedies, Rock said. Other approaches include denaturalization and deportation or dropping the cases entirely.

Turning his attention to the Finta decision, Rock said the legal principles enunciated by the High Court are unacceptable. "It cannot stand as the law of the country," he said, though he did not indicate any specific proposals for changing the law.

B'nai Brith and the Canadian Holocaust Remembrance Association were extremely critical of the Supreme Court decision, which they contend allows a suspected war criminal to rely on a pervasive anti-Semitic atmosphere in society to justify criminal acts. The decision will make the successful criminal prosecution of someone operating in an anti-Semitic milieu almost impossible, the groups say.

Rock's decision to stay the charges against Grujicic elicited disappointment from Canadian Jewish Congress and B'nai Brith, but not heavy criticism.



Allan Rock

"While we are disappointed that the process of prosecuting suspected Nazi war criminals continues to be stalled, we understand the Crown's decision," said Milton Harris, chair of Congress' war crimes committee.

Harris called on federal authorities to begin denaturalization proceedings against other war crimes suspects.

Concerns over delays

Marvin Kurz, a spokesman on war crimes for B'nai Brith's League for Human Rights, said, "The problem is one of delay and it points out the difficulty in dealing with [these cases] on a criminal basis. We're still concerned over the delay in processing war crimes cases. Why did it take so long to charge him in the first place?"

Sol Littman, Canadian representative of the Simon Wiesenthal Centre, recalled that on Dec. 14, 1992, shortly after Grujicic was charged, he had cautioned then justice minister Kim Campbell about the case.

Littman recalled that even then, he had suggested that Grujicic be immediately subjected to a medical examination to determine whether he was fit to stand trial. Despite that caution, the case proceeded. "The result was numerous delays while Grujicic went in and out of hospital," Littman noted.

"Frankly, it was as if the Justice Department, which has never been enthusiastic about the chase after war criminals, was determined to discredit the whole war crimes prosecution process; to make it seem pitiless and vengeful in the eyes of the Canadian public," Littman said.

Earlier, Justice James Donnelly revealed in court Grujicic's post-war involvement as an RCMP informant spying on suspected communists in Canada. Operating under the alias Marko Jankovic, Grujicic's cover was blown in 1951 when a communist newspaper in Toronto revealed his background, the Windsor Star reported.

Yugoslavia then began calling for his extradition but the RCMP told Ottawa that Grujicic was not the man Yugoslavia wanted. That deception continued until 1983 when the last Yugoslav request for his extradition was made. Altogether, the East Bloc country requested his extradition four times, in 1952, 1961, 1971 and 1983, the Star reported.

Canada had the opportunity to deal with Grujicic for more than 40 years, Justice Donnelly told the court, according to the Star. In a two-hour and 45-minute ruling in which he read from Canadian Security Intelligence Service (CSIS) documents, Donnelly said the special branch of the RCMP withheld information regarding Grujicic's true identity from police offices and Canadian government departments.

Justice Donnelly quoted an in-office memo, dated June 29, 1961, saying that the RCMP had deliberately misled the Department of Citizenship and Immigration with respect to Grujicic's true identity, the Star reported.

"The time to try Radislav Grujicic has come and gone," Justice Donnelly told court. "This would be a gross violation of the community's sense of fair play and decency." Grujicic's physical and mental condition are so bad that "his presence [in court] is no more than tokenism," the judge said.

Film festival's actions upset Israeli Consulate

By DAVID LAZARUS
CJN Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — The Israeli Consulate says it would consider raising the level of diplomatic intervention if the Montreal World Film Festival does not respond to a letter it sent to festival director Serge Losique over the inclusion of "Palestine" as a participating country.

After several weeks of trying the informal route and waiting for a return telephone call from Losique, an increasingly impatient consulate mailed him a formal letter on Sept. 9, Israeli consul Aviva Raz told The CJN.

The letter "simply says that Israel has always had a very good relationship with the festival, but that it has found it necessary to write him to explain that according to the Declaration of Principles [signed between Israel and the PLO] and the international community, Palestine is not recognized as a country," Raz said.

"We have asked him that it not happen again."

If Losique replies that it would again be prepared to list "Palestine" as a country, then Israel might have to reconsider the nature of its relationship with the festival, approach festival sponsors, or raise the level of diplomatic intervention, Raz said.

"Right now it's at the festival level. We hope it can stay at the festival level," she said.

The film listed under the "Palestine" heading at the festival, which ran from August 25 to Sept. 5, was a Palestinian-Dutch production, Curfew, depicting the life of a family in the Gaza Strip.

The film has won three awards, including a UNESCO prize at Cannes, which also listed the film as coming from "Palestine."

Raz stressed that Israel "has no problem with" and even "welcomes" the presence of Palestinian film productions at the Montreal festival. Such films have also been screened in Israel, she said.

"The only thing wrong is the way it was published [as a participating country]," she said. "We just want them to acknowledge they made a mistake."

She said the consulate was prepared to give Losique sufficient "time to respond" by waiting until the end of the month before trying other options.

Raz, in reply to a question, said it was completely normal for a consulate such as Israel's to try first the informal approach before resorting to a formal letter.

Israeli, Arab representatives join in maritime symposium

By JOEL JACOBSON
CJN Maritimes Correspondent

HALIFAX — A recent four-day symposium on Mideast maritime cooperation held here would have been "unthinkable" two years ago, said a high ranking Israeli defence ministry official.

The official, who requested anonomity, attended the Canadian-hosted conference along with an admiral and captain from the Israeli navy.

Beginning August 29, they met with representatives of 10 Arab nations to discuss marine search-and-rescue operations, prevention of incidents at sea and regional maritime security.

Mideast delegates represented Algeria, Egypt, Jordan, Kuwait, Oman, Tunisia, Yemen, United Arab Emirates and the Palestinians. There were also representatives from Russia, the United States, Canadian Maritime Command and the Canadian Coast Guard.

The Israeli official said it was amazing that everyone "could sit in one room and talk about how to work together. There is growing recognition that Israel is part of the region, a legitimate player. That was a tremendous reaction."

This was the fourth of an ongoing series of meetings of Middle Eastern nations generated by the United States and the former Soviet Union. Canada was asked to lead the maritime confidence-building measures.

The process, said the Israeli official, was not easy for the Arabs. "For them, it was a shock this was happening. But the ice melted. They saw we didn't have horns and gradually we got to talking business."

Jill Sinclair, director of the non-proliferation, arms control and disarmament division of Department of Foreign Affairs and International Trade, led the Canadian delegation and called the meetings "productive."

"The issues we discussed transcend the peace process in the Middle East. We were talking of life, of saving people in distress. Naval forces work in very confined areas and we discussed developing systems to help avoid confrontations at sea or political problems that could result."

She said the delegates were very willing to put politics aside and talk. "They developed relationships that had never existed before. The ambiance of the meeting was really extraordinary. They held many impromptu conversations and socialized together after-hours. They were really developing human relationships."

The first meeting was held in September 1993, at the Canadian Coast Guard College near Sydney, where search-and-rescue and prevention of incidents at sea were discussed. Talks resumed last March in Turkey and continued in a practical demonstration off the coast of Italy in July.

Sinclair said it is significant that Israeli and Arab naval officers would get together. "The fact that such high-level officers were sent here means their governments are concerned. We know the officers will return to their countries, talk to their people and take back a positive message."

She said there are plans to hold another, more formal, session in November to study the results of the first series of meetings and decide where to go next.

The symposium was organized by Dalhousie University's Centre for Foreign Police Studies on behalf of the Department of Foreign Affairs and International Trade.

A senior Dalhousie University official termed the conference "sensitive and semi-secret," but called it one of the most interesting things in the decade he has been at the university.

"At a dinner we hosted, I sat between an Israeli and Egyptian and was amazed at how well they communicated. Later at the bar, they were talking together and I found it really touching. They were establishing relationships that will make it easy to pick up the phone and talk about search and rescue situations and other issues."

Women's issues project to be launched

By MAURICE LUCOW
CJN Western Correspondent

VANCOUVER — A national project dealing with a multitude of women's issues will be launched in Winnipeg by Canadian Hadassah-WIZO on Oct. 6, to mark the opening of Hadassah-WIZO month, says Judy Mandleman, national president.

The project, called Women for Women, is part of an undertaking by the Women's International Zionist Organization (WIZO) to help Israeli women in crisis with shelters for battered wives, telephone hot lines "to provide a listening ear and moral support," prevention and treatment of family abuse while the family continues to live in the community, information centres on women's rights and other relevant services. WIZO is a non-governmental organization (NGO) recognized by the United Nations.

Canadian Hadassah-WIZO is also involved with the Canadian Coalition of Jewish Women for the Get, a lobby group calling for a woman's right to receive a get. It is also an active member of the International Coalition for Agunah Rights (ICAR).

Shirley Croll of Montreal, national chair of Women for Women, says that "the moment our national president presented the concept to the national executive, the response was resoundingly enthusiastic."

A minimum contribution of $180 enlists members in Women for Women, says Croll. A specially designed pin will be given to all donors.

Croll said in a message in Orah, the organization's publication, that "the problems are many and it is incumbent on us, the largest women's Zionist organization in Canada, to address these needs."

Besides the battering of women, desertion and the fear of leaving an abusive husband to seek employment, said Croll, there are increasing demands for day care. And, she added, "there is the plight of the agunah and the problem of obtaining a Jewish get . . . We can't alleviate all these shocking conditions but the longest march begins with the first step. Let's take those first steps," she urged.

The launch of Hadassah-WIZO month, to be chaired by Lenore Kagan, of Winnipeg, will feature Sheila Finestone as keynote speaker. Montreal MP Finestone, a longtime Hadassah member, is secretary of state for multiculturalism and the status of women.

Finestone revealed in a statement to Hadassah-WIZO that she will be attending an international conference of Jewish leaders in Israel in November. This will be a forerunner to a series of international meetings to prepare for the fourth United Nations World Conference on Women to be held in Beijing in 1995.

Neo-Nazi catalogue cause of concern

By MYRON LOVE
CJN Prairie Correspondent

WINNIPEG — Winnipeg police and community leaders are expressing concern over the appearance of a catalogue promoting racism and Nazism.

The catalogue features consumer items such as mugs, ashtrays and T-shirts with racist and Nazi messages. It is put out by a company called New Dawn Distributors — the latest venture of William Harcus, the self-proclaimed leader of the Ku Klux Klan in Manitoba.

Two years ago, Harcus, then 21, and two associates were charged with advocating genocide. It was the first time that charge had ever been laid in Canada. The charge and other charges were dropped after their lawyer Doug Christie forced an undercover police officer to admit under oath that she had used information from illegal wiretaps in writing her notes about meetings with Harcus and friends.

While no charges are currently being considered against Harcus as a result of his catalogue, Winnipeg police crime inspector Con Gislason reports that the Hate Crimes Unit has been monitoring Harcus's activities on an ongoing basis and will continue to watch him carefully.

For Michael Werier, the Winnipeg Jewish Community Council's vice-president in charge of community relations, the answer is public education.

Bergman, Copeman savour victory in Quebec election

By JANICE ARNOLD
CJN Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Liberal Lawrence Bergman's 2-to-1 margin of victory is a clear indication that the Jewish community wants to be on the side of the organized opposition to the Parti Quebecois' (PQ) sovereigntist agenda.

Robert Libman's personal popularity and hard-fought campaign were not enough to re-elect him as an independent in D'Arcy McGee.

Bergman's decisive victory came after an awkward start — he began his campaign with the ill-chosen statement "Independent thought and action will not get us anywhere" — and a finish that saw him subjected to criticsm for bowing out of two debates with Libman — one on the mass audience CJAD radio station and the other at the Beth Israel Beth Aaron Synagogue.

Bergman also weathered the controversy over the Liberal candidacy of Yvon Charbonneau, former anti-Zionist. (Charbonneau was elected in Bourassa riding.)

Correctly gauging the mood of the electors, Bergman stuck to the same theme throughout: this election is about national unity and the only way to stop separation is to vote Liberal.

The Liberals evidently considered Libman enough of a threat to make a sudden decision, announced with much fanfare at a press conference in D'Arcy McGee, in favor of permitting the Jewish schools to associate with the Montreal Catholic school board.

Bergman never had any doubts. "The support was there right from the time I announced my nomination in January. People were coming back to the Liberal party even then."

He credits his campaign team and their determination to keep discourse at a "high level" for much of his success. Nevertheless, exchanges between Libman and Bergman were often petty.

As for the rough ride he took in the last 10 days of the campaign, Bergman commented: "I was always convinced I could talk over the heads of the press to the people. I debated four times during the campaign, but this [bowing out of the last two debates] was not really an issue with the people anyway."

Bergman, 54, said his priorities are the needs of the youth and elderly of the riding. He entered politics, he says, because he believes Jews have deep roots in Quebec and should play an important role in its future. He points to the fact that his parents were born and raised in small francophone towns in Quebec, where they were fully accepted.

"Fear is a powerful motivator," Libman said of the Liberal win. "But I don't think I have anything to be ashamed of by getting 10,000 votes as an independent.

"In 1989, I rode a wave; in 1994 I was staring one down," he said. In 1984, he led the newly-formed Equality Party to four National Assembly seats in the wake of anglo anger over language legislation (Bill 178).

For Libman, 34, it is literally back to the drawing board. His plans are to return to his former profession of architecture. But he is not ruling out a return to politics someday; he offered to assist the federalist forces in the referendum campaign if he is asked.

After leaving Equality, Libman was rebuffed by the party in his attempt to seek the Liberal nomination in D'Arcy McGee last December.

"If there is any consolation it is that it was a unique experience for a young Jewish anglophone to play such a role in Quebec during such an exciting time."

Bergman is one of two Jews elected to the National Assembly. Russell Copeman, 34, enjoyed a landslide in Notre-Dame-de-Grace, garnering 21,716 votes to the PQ's 3,944 and obliterating independent incumbent Gordon Atkinson and Equality leader Keith Henderson.

"One of my goals was to double the Jewish representation in the National Assembly," Copeman joked. "But even I was surprised by the margin of victory."

Copeman, who once worked for Alliance Quebec, was former premier Robert Bourassa's constituency aide in the St. Laurent riding office.

"The Equality message just didn't click," he said, promising to serve the riding "honestly and faithfully."

In Outremont, the PQ's Salomon Cohen, whose Jewish and Sephardi identity was displayed as proof that the party welcomes ethnic minorities, went down to a stunning defeat. Gerald Tremblay, the former industry minister, won by 19,094 votes to Cohen's 9,673. In 1989, Tremblay took the riding by a margin of less than 2,900 votes.

Tremblay probably was helped by a change in the riding's boundaries, extending it into the Snowdon area which has a significant Jewish and non-francophone population.

Cohen's attempts to woo the large chassidic community in the city of Outremont appear to have been in vain. The polls in their neighborhoods showed solid support for the Liberals.

Libman gracious in defeat

Bergman sees himself as having the ability to reconcile the interests of the minorities and majority in Quebec, a skill he said he acquired after 30 years as a notary.

He is president of the Adath Israel Poale Zedek Synagogue in Hampstead.

Libman was gracious in defeat, crossing the concourse of the Cavendish Mall to congratulate Bergman when it became clear he was well on the way to his eventual 21,325 to 10,381-vote victory.

Montreal shuls to press for reopening of Finta case

By DAVID LAZARUS
CJN Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — The Supreme Court of Canada will hear new arguments next month urging it to rethink or clarify its refusal last June to reconsider the 1990 acquittal by jury of suspected war criminal Imre Finta.

The arguments will be presented by a coalition of six Montreal synagogues.

In June the Court rejected by a narrow margin a request by B'nai Brith Canada and the Canadian Holocaust Remembrance Committee to rehear the case.

The Jewish organizations launched the appeal after hearing a majority Supreme Court ruling in March that Finta, an 81-year-old Torontonian acquitted of helping to round up over 8,600 Jews in Nazi-occupied Hungary, should not be tried again and that federal prosecutors had made legal mistakes in presenting their case against him.

Jewish groups are worried that the ruling will hamper or even put an end to efforts to pursue suspected Nazi war criminals in Canada by possibly allowing an "acting in good faith" defence.

Now, new arguments are being put forward by six Montreal synagogues that have filed a new application before the Court requesting that the case be reheard or that its June decision be elaborated upon.

The coalition said its synagogues speak for a total of 5,000 families, "many of them survivors or children of survivors of the Holocaust and/or relatives of persons who did not survive the Holocaust."

"We hope the Court will reconsider this case," Rabbi Martin Penn, spiritual leader of the Congregation Shomrim Laboker Beth Yehudah Shaare Tefillah, told The CJN. "We really feel there are merits to it. The brief has additional information and reference points in law."

The five other Montreal synagogues in the coalition are the Beth Hamedresh Hagadol Tifereth Israel, Beth Israel Beth Aaron, Beth Ora, Communaute Sepharade Petah Tikvah, and Shaar Hashomayim.

The 62-page brief, prepared by the Ottawa law firm of Soloway, Wright and Victor on behalf of the coalition, raises 13 legal points it wishes the Court to consider.

Among them are the definition of "barbarous cruelty" as used by the original trial judge and the concept of what constitutes "instant obedience" with regard to a war crime.

What appears of particular interest to the appellants is the legal distinction between orders that "must be obeyed" and those that "may be obeyed."

The brief also raises questions about using the "mistaken belief" argument as it pertains to war crimes.

The brief says the "mistaken belief" argument can not be used as a defence against war crimes because if "the actual lawfulness in foreign law is never a defence [as the law already states], then it will follow that mistaken belief in [the] lawfulness of foreign law is [also] never a defence..."

The brief, in its final point, takes issue with the Supreme Court's opinion that Finta's original trial judge dealt appropriately with the fact that Finta's defence lawyer, Doug Christie, read from the trial of Jesus in the Book of Mark.

The Supreme Court concluded that the trial judge "carefully instructed" the jury not to be "influenced" by the potentially prejudicial nature of Chrisitie's action.

But the coalition is arguing that the trial judge did not go far enough.

"A clear, unequivocal direction with respect to a significant prejudicial statment of counsel cannot be made without naming and contradicting that statment," the brief states.

"The coalition is concerned that if there is not a rehearing on this issue, any Jews appearing in court in Canada will be subject...to having the trial of Jesus read against him or her, with no more specific correction than was provided by the trial judge in Finta..."

Rabbi Penn said Jewish groups would continue to "press the court" and consider lobbying for legislative changes to increase the odds of war crimes convictions, since none have taken place since the "made-in-Canada" legislation allowing domestic trials for suspected war criminals was passed in 1987.

The News in Brief

Israel Pledges to Haiti Mop-up

TEL AVIV — Israel has pledged to send 30 police officers to Haiti once U.S. Army forces leave there.

Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin authorized the contingent after President Bill Clinton telephoned for Israeli assistance in the efforts to oust Haiti's military regime.

Israel's commitment was made prior to Sunday's last-minute aversion of a full-scale military invasion of Haiti.

Clinton did not request Israeli military participation in any invasion but was seeking civilian police participation to maintain law and order in Haiti.

The Israeli police officers will include current and retired police officers.

'Dual' Israelis Can Cross

TEL AVIV — Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin last week signed an order allowing Israelis with dual citizenship to travel from Israel to Jordan on their foreign passports.

The move enables Israelis to make the trip to Jordan without having to obtain formal permission from the Interior Ministry.

Travel agents have already reportedly signed up scores of such dual-passport Israelis for visits to Jordan.

When Israel and Jordan signed their non-aggression pact July 25, Rabin and King Hussein agreed to open border crossings for third-country nationals to travel between the two countries.

But Israelis holding a second passport were unable to travel to Jordan until now.

Israeli to UN Post

UNITED NATIONS — For the third time in a year, an Israeli has been elected to a United Nations post.

David Kretzmer, a Hebrew University professor who is director of the school's Centre for Human Rights, was elected to serve on the UN's Human Rights Committee.

"As meaningful as the vote itself is the new atmosphere in Israel-UN relations that the vote symbolizes," said Gad Ya'acobi, Israel's ambassador to the United Nations.

Guatemala to Move Embassy

TEL AVIV — Guatemala is relocating its embassy to Jerusalem, Guatemalan President Ramiro de Leon Carpio has announced.

Until 1980, the Guatemalan embassy — along with 13 other foreign missions — was located in Jerusalem. But after the Knesset passed the Jerusalem Law, declaring Jerusalem Israel's capital, Arab pressure led the embassies to relocate to the Tel Aviv area.

With the recent announcement, Guatemala joins Costa Rica and El Salvador, which returned their embassies to Jerusalem in the early 1980s.

Envoy to Russia Named

MOSCOW — Aliza Shenhar, rector of the University of Haifa, has been named Israel's next ambassador to Russia.

Shenhar will fill the post left vacant by Haim Bar-Lev, who died of a heart attack in May.

Shenhar, 51, a literature professor with a specialty in folklore, is a political appointee with no diplomatic background.

She speaks English, Hebrew and German, but she does not speak Russian. However, she is currently undergoing intensive Russian language training.

Her date of arrival in Moscow is not yet known.

Bones of Jews Unburied

MOSCOW — The bones of thousands of Jewish victims of Nazism are lying exposed on a hillside in Crimea, and local authorities say they cannot afford to bury them.

"It is absolutely dreadful. Bones and skulls lie on the surface mixed up with dirt and litter, and nobody even worries about it," Leonid Geftman, a Crimean Jewish leader, recently told the Moscow Times newspaper.

Geftman said the bones date from a massacre in December 1941, when 4,000 people — almost all the Jews from Yalta and nearby — were herded to a site near Yalta and killed.

The massacre site was then blown up to hide the evidence, Geftman explained. But this March, heavy rains washed away the soil on the hillside, revealing hundreds of thousands of bones.

Local officials told the Moscow Times that while it is "necessary" to bury the bones, their budget is so stretched that they lack funds "even for the living."

In the interim, said Geftman, the massacre site has become a popular spot for thieves, who pick through the remains in search of gold tooth crowns and other items of value.

An official at the Israeli embassy in Moscow said he thought Israel would try to help the Yalta city government, but did not provide details.

Yiddish Conference in Kiev

KIEV — About 150 scholars and writers from Ukraine, Russia, other European countries, Israel and the United States recently took part in an international Yiddish conference here.

The conference, held in late August, returned Kiev to the map of Yiddish-speaking cities, following a gap of more than 60 years, during which the Communists erased traces of Jewish culture and the Nazis eradicated Jews.

The conference, held in the House of Artists, was preceded by a "Seminar on Jewish Civilization and Jewish Thought," attended by about 100 scholars.

Camp Monument Defaced

AMSTERDAM — Swastikas and other Nazis slogans were daubed by unknown vandals on a monument at the site of the former Vught concentration camp one day after it was unveiled this month.

The daubings, in white paint, were immediately removed and a second gathering was held later the same day to honor the 2,800 men, mostly members of the Dutch resistance, who in the autumn of 1944 were taken from there to Sachsenhausen, in Germany.

Dutch Royals to Visit

AMSTERDAM — Holland's Queen Beatrix and her husband, Prince Consort Claus, will pay a three-day state visit to Jordan Dec. 8-10 and a three-day state trip to Israel from March 27-29.

Announcement of the visits follows years in which the Dutch Foreign Ministry determined that an official visit by the royal couple to the two countries was too sensitive.

There is no longer any apparent obstacle to the visits since Israel and Jordan have ended their state of war.

Beatrix and Claus paid a semi-official visit to Israel in the early 1970s when she was still a crown princess. She made the trip to open a hospital wing that had been named after her.

Jewish Candidate Attacked

CURITIBA, Brazil — A Jewish candidate for governor of the Brazilian state of Parana has become the target of anti-Semitic attacks.

Vandals sprayed anti-Jewish slogans on the wall of the Jewish cemetery and on 15 billboards advertising the candidacy of Jaime Lerner last week.

Lerner, who is leading in his race for governor of Parana, is the former mayor of Curitiba.

The graffiti called Lerner "Jew and anti-Christ."

As well, Lerner has been labeled "anti-Christian" on radio and television.

Vincent Goulart, an evangelical minister who is running for state deputy in the same elections, said during a political broadcast that Lerner could be compared with historic figures who had been against God and were therefore "punished." Among those he mentioned were Lenin and Hitler.

Dolphin Inquiry Launched

JERUSALEM — Twelve dead dolphins have washed up on Israeli shores this year, prompting an investigation by sea mammal specialists.

A veterinarian who did the postmortem on the dead dolphins found high amounts of lead in the animals, said Oz Gofman, a dolphin researcher at Ma'agan Michael's Sea Mammal Research and Rescue Centre.

"Dolphins are to sea creatures what man is to land creatures," Gofman stated. "If so many start dying in such a short period, it should turn on a red light among humans."

Researchers point to poisoned fish as the most logical reason for the dolphins' deaths, and hinted that humans could also be affected.

CJC Blasts Veil Ruling

MONTREAL — Canadian Jewish Congress has expressed its "profound dismay" at the recent decision taken by a school official here to dismiss a Muslim student from classes because she wore a veil.

Normand Dore of the Montreal Catholic School Commission was reported to have stated that he took the measure because the wearing of "distinctive garb like the hijab (veil) or a neo-Nazi insignia might invite aggressive behavior from young people."

Such an analogy is "abhorrent," said Max Bernard, chair of CJC Quebec region's community relations committee.

CJC has called on school officials to re-examine policies on the wearing of religious headgear.

Israelis show solidarity with Golan settlers

Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM — Thousands of people from throughout Israel trekked to Gamla, on the southern reaches of the Golan, over the weekend to show solidarity with a hunger strike protest by settlers fighting to keep the region under Israeli rule.

The hunger strike is now in its second week.

Among the visitors were 15 residents of Druse villages on the Golan, as well as Agriculture Minister Ya'acov Tsur and United Kibbutz Movement secretary-general Arik Reichman.

Tsomet party leader Rafael Eitan and members of the party's secretariat held a meeting at the site.

The entire population of Kibbutz El Rom, in the Golan's north, also made the trip to Gamla on Friday to show solidarity with the strikers.

The kibbutz was closed down for the day in protest over reports that it was likely to be the first Jewish settlement on the Golan to be dismantled in the initial stage of a peace deal with Syria.

Kibbutz members said they called for an urgent meeting with Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin to clarify the Israel Radio reports on Friday that El Rom would be dismantled as part of the first stage of withdrawal Israel has proposed to Syria.

El Rom member Shalom Blair said Rabin had to honor pledges that a referendum or election would be held in the event of any territorial concessions on the Golan.

No response from Rabin

He said that so far, Golan residents had not received any response to their phone calls, letters and faxes to Rabin, calling for an urgent meeting.

El Rom, founded in 1971, is one of the oldest settlements on the Golan. At an emergency meeting last week, members decided to support the fight of the Golan Settlers Committee against any withdrawal from the region.

Reform Party expells Heritage Front member

TORONTO — The Reform Party of Canada expelled a member of the white supremacist Heritage Front from its ranks last week.

Max French, a 34-year-old transportation worker, had his membership terminated, after it was revealed he was a member of the party's riding association in Scarborough West. Earlier, he had told the Toronto Star that he intended to run for mayor of Scarborough on a Heritage Front/Reform ticket. He also stated that three members of the Heritage Front currently serve as executives on Reform riding associations in Scarborough.

Preston Manning

Reform leader Preston Manning called for an investigation into whether the Canadian Security Intelligence Service (CSIS) or the Progressive Conservative Party were connected to the involvement of Heritage Front members in the Reform Party. He called on the parliamentary subcommittee which had begun an investigation into CSIS activities to check into possible political connections between CSIS and the Tories.

Reform party spokesmen have suggested there may be ties between alleged CSIS informant Grant Bristow, who infiltrated the Heritage Front, and the involvement of Heritage Front members in Reform as part of an attempt to discredit the Reform party.

Manning said the party will make every effort to root out Heritage Front members.

Jewish community's dialogue with PQ expected to continue

"The community maintained a constructive dialogue with the PQ while it was in opposition and we expect that to continue," he said. "The Jews of Quebec have the same right to public funds as any citizen."

Drysdale is a recent immigrant. American-born, he came to Montreal from Vancouver two years ago on the eve of the Charlottetown vote. "I have absolutely no regrets."

"There's no sense of panic," Rabbi Reuben Poupko affirmed. "People are taking what has happened in stride. They see this as a normal, healthy desire for change in government and not a threatening event," he said.

Jim Torczyner, the McGill University professor who co-authored the recent demographic study of the Montreal Jewish community, says that by his "perverse reasoning" the election results are probably a best-case scenario.

"If the Liberals had won, the PQ would continue to badger them. The fact that the PQ won with the tiniest majority (percentage-wise) means they have not been given a mandate to push very hard for separation. It's going to have to balance so many interests and that cannot be done through radical options."

Pequistes went to Israel

Thomas Hecht, chair of the Canada-Israel Committee, Quebec region, who has made it a point to form close ties with the PQ and other nationalists, believes the Jewish community must be "pragmatic" in its relations with government.

He is confident the relationships he has cultivated will serve the community well. Three of the Quebecers who went on a trip to Israel Hecht led in 1993 are newly elected Pequistes: Sylvain Simard, Richard Le Hir and Rita Dionne-Marsolais.

Hecht believes Quebec is in for a period of instability but ultimately will choose to remain a part of Canada in a "looser confederation" — an option he supports.

"Canada is too large a country with too small a population [to continue with the status quo]. In addition, the global trends are north-south not east-west."

Nevertheless, he stressed that he is "pro-Canada" because it has provided Jews with a "generous and tolerant society" in which to be themselves.

Rabbinical Reflections

Simchat Torah

Torah education must continue despite sacrifices

By RABBI AARON LEVINE

I am distressed to no end, together with many others, each time I think of the fact that our province blatantly discriminates against Jewish educational institutions (and other non-Jewish systems) by not providing them with provincial aid as it does for the Catholic school system.

What adds insult to injury is the fact that a hefty part of my tax dollars (and yours) goes to support the public school system or the Catholic system, but I (we) cannot even earmark those dollars for the education of my (our) own children.

Kudos to all those in our community (led by Murray Segal, Rabbi Irwin Witty and Bernie Farber) who have fought so hard (and who I am sure will not give up the battle in the future), to rectify this gross inequity. It really is mind-boggling when you think of it. Halevai we would have the political clout necessary to convincingly demonstrate to government the absurdity in our time of this position.

Until that time, may it come speedily, we must recognize that Torah education must continue despite all the sacrifices, both personal and communal. And those who do not send their children to Jewish day schools, with the excuse that the cost is prohibitive, (and it is), must re-examine their priorities in life.

I want to share with you just one story of the many that portray for us how Jewish parents once valued a Torah education and the extent of their sacrifice to ensure that their children would not be deprived of it. It would do us all well to reflect on it as we celebrate Simchat Torah and dance with the Torah — the source of all Jewish knowledge and education.

One of the great gaonim (Torah giants) of the 19th century, Rabbi Yaakov David Wilowsky, known as the Ridvaz, (1845-1913), who published two classic commentaries on the Jerusalem Talmud, lived the last years of his life in Safed (Tzefas), in Eretz Yisrael.

One cold winter afternoon on the day of his father's yahrzeit he came early to shul for Mincha. As he stood meditating at his shtender (lectern), lost in thought, tears welled up in his eyes and he started to cry softly to himself. People in shul knew the Rav had yahrzeit so they respectfully kept their distance, assuming that he was remembering his departed father.

But a close friend summoned up the courage to confront Reb Yaakov and asked him why he was so upset. After all, his father lived to a ripe old age and had died fifty years ago! The Ridvaz, composing himself, told his questioner the following story.

"When I was a young boy my father hired for me the best melamed (teacher) that was available. My father was poor and worked very hard to scrape together the ruble a month (quite a large sum of money in those days) to pay my tuition. One winter, business was bad, for my father made his living constructing furnaces, and there happened to be a severe shortage of cement and lime. One day, after three months of not paying tuition, I brought a note home from the melamed informing my father that if payment in full was not received the next day, he would be forced to discontinue teaching me, and would have to look for another student.

"My parents were devastated. My Torah study meant everything in the world to them. Nothing could stand in the way of my becoming a Torah scholar.

"That evening at shul, my father heard a wealthy man offer six rubles to whoever would be able to provide a furnace for the house that was being built for his son and future daughter-in-law. A furnace meant heat in the home and the ability to cook hot food. Due to the shortage of materials the contractors could not build the furnace.

"When he came home from shul, my father discussed the matter with my mother, and they agreed to dismantle their furnace brick by brick so they could build the furnace for the rich man and thus have six rubles for my tuition. They did just that and when he received the six rubles my father said to me proudly, 'Tell the melamed, three rubles are for what we owe, and three for the next three months tuition for my Yankel Dovid.'

"The winter was bitter and we suffered and shivered through the cold. All for what? So that I should have the best melamed and develop my Torah knowledge."

The Ridvaz paused and then continued. "This afternoon it was very cold outside and I was thinking of arranging a minyan for my father's yahrzeit at home rather than at shul. Then in honor of my father I decided it was proper to make the effort to go to shul. When I arrived I reminded myself of the sacrifice my parents made to endure that bitter winter just for me and my Torah learning. I cried because I realized and remembered the boundless love and devotion that only parents can have so that their child can learn our holy Torah."

That's why the Ridvaz grew up to be the Torah giant that he was. And that's how we can ensure that our children grow up to be Torah-knowledgeable Jews. It will definitely take some sacrifice — but it's worth it. Let's think a little about this, this Simchat Torah! Chag Somayach!

Israel denies pursuing peace with Iraq

Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM — Washington and Jerusalem are said to be on a collision course over Israeli attempts to draw Iraq into an expanded Middle East peace process and, in the process, dilute existing UN sanctions against Iraq, according to sources in London.

Citing British intelligence, last weekend's edition of The Sunday Times reported that senior Israeli officials and Iraq's deputy prime minister Tarik Aziz had met secretly in the Moroccan capital of Rabat last month to discuss "an accommodation."

The Times, which attributed its report to the MI6 intelligence agency, said the Israeli officials included Housing Minister Binyamin Ben-Eliezer and a second minister, possibly Police Minister Moshe Shahal, both of whom are of Iraqi origin.

The Rabat encounter was reportedly held when Aziz flew to Morocco from Amman, where his visit had excited widespread speculation over a possible rapprochement with Israel and where he had spoken confidently of UN sanctions being lifted.

According to the sources, Iraqi and Israeli officials also met in Jordan around the time Foreign Minister Shimon Peres made his first public visit to Jordan.

However, Israeli officials last Sunday denied a summit meeting has occurred with Iraqi leaders, or that Israel is pursuing any deal with Baghdad.

Officials say Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin is unequivocal that such contacts must be avoided at all costs, as it can only weaken the the international community's resolve to maintain UN sanctions against Iraq.

Participants in a closed door meeting of the Labor Party parliamentary faction last week cite Rabin as saying there were "signs" Baghdad's attitude towards Israel was undergoing change, but made clear that Israel would not meet with any Iraqi officials.

The latest row comes against the backdrop of strenuous U.S. efforts, supported by Britain, to resist pressure from the other permanent members of the UN Security Council (Russia, China and France) to abandon the sanctions.

Israelis enjoy balmy Sukkot

Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM — Warmer than usual temperatures and the completion of the shmitta year are adding a new dimension to this year's Sukkot celebrations in Israel.

The fact that the Jewish holidays began in early September this year has provided Israelis with an extended summer vacation — and they are making the most of it.

Taking advantage of the balmy weather — and the fact that all schools and many companies are closed for Sukkot — hundreds of thousands of Israelis have flocked to the seashore or completely flown the coop to Europe, Greece and Turkey.

About 1,000 Israelis with second passports were also expected to travel to Jordan, now that Israel is permitting dual passport-holders to visit their Arab neighbor.

Many of those who decided to remain in the capital for the holiday shopped for lulavs, etrogs and sukkah decorations in the huge Mea Shearim open-air market.

Located on the main street of Jerusalem's most religious neighborhood, the market is a once-a-year happening that attracts religious Jews from all over the country.

Closed to traffic a few days before the start of the festival, Mea Shearim Street was all tumult and activity as people walked from booth to booth, comparing the price and selection of sukkah decorations.

In addition to posters of religious texts and famous rabbis, the decorations included red and green tinsel and tiny flashing lights — items usually associated with Christmas.

American yeshiva students in Israel for the year could be heard exclaiming, "Those are the lights people put on Christmas trees. What are they doing here in Mea Shearim?"

Amused by the question, which he had heard many times before, a vendor told the students, "These are just decorations, and since Israelis don't celebrate Christmas, they don't associate lights and tinsel with anything Christian. As far as people here are concerned, these are just pretty lights."

This year's selection of etrogs was smaller than usual, other vendors said, because of the shmitta year that was just concluded.

Oded Elbert, one of the hundreds selling etrogs, explained that "during the shmitta year, the land lies fallow. Theoretically, all of the fruit is there for the taking, but the reality is that the farmers must continue to make a living."

In order to comply with tradition and still make a living, he said, "the farmers sell their land to the Beth Din (the religious court), which in turn sells the produce to the public at cost."

This year's crop of etrogs was much smaller than usual, Elbert said, "because during shmitta, farmers are prohibited from providing all but the most basic care to their trees and plants. They can keep their plants alive by watering them, but nothing more than that."

The etrogs on sale reflected this low level of maintenance. According to many vendors, much of the shmitta-year crop was not fit for use during Sukkot. Yet, despite the smaller number of etrogs on the market this year, prices remained fairly consistent with non-shmitta prices, thanks to the non-profit policy of the Beth Din.

A young yeshiva student who identified himself only as Yonasson admitted that the shmitta year had made the selection of etrogs "much more challenging." But, he added, "only people living in Israel can fulfill this mitzvah, and I consider it a privilege."

David and Ayala Levin-Kruss, one of the few married couples shopping together for lulavs and etrogs, recalled how they bought a sukkah before they were married.

"It was our first joint purchase before we were married," Ayala Levin-Kruss recalled, "and we used four of the poles for our chuppah. It's a nice thing to think about when we sit in the sukkah."

Austrians coming to terms with Nazi past

Reporting from Vienna, Sheldon Kirshner looks at Austria's Nazi past and its attempts to come to grips with it.

By SHELDON KIRSHNER

For years after World War II, Austria basked in the blithe, blissful belief that it was a victim of German Nazism rather than an active participant in its crimes.

But of late, the Austrian government itself has begun to question this convenient, self-serving view.

Until quite recently, most Austrians claimed, somewhat self-righteously, that they were victims by virtue of Nazi Germany's annexation of Austria in 1938. Indeed, Austrians could point to the 1943 Moscow Declaration, signed by the United States, the Soviet Union and Britain, which described Austria as "the first victim of Hitlerite aggression."

After the war, buoyed by this document, Austria's political establishment buried the ugly, unsavory past. And, observes historian Walter Manoschek of the Institute of Political Studies, Austrians "tried to pretend that the period from 1938 to 1945 was not a chapter in Austrian history."

Austria's attitude of self-forgiveness and its refusal to accept historical responsibility for its role in the Third Reich — which was neatly encapsulated in the 1965 Hollywood film The Sound of Music — was totally unlike that of Germany's, notes Richard Mitten, director of the Centre for International and Interdisciplinary Studies at the University of Vienna.

As a result, Austrian reparation payments to Holocaust survivors were minimal and school texts all but ignored Austria's Nazi legacy.

Yet the unvarnished, unpalatable truth about Austria haunted the enlightened portion of its population: Adolf Hitler, born in Braunau, Austria, developed his pathological anti-Semitism in Vienna. Many Austrians exulted in the 1938 Anschluss (Austria's incorporation into Germany). A disproportionate number of high-ranking Nazis and concentration camp administrators were Austrians.

"Austrian society was a society of perpetrators, not victims," charges Manoschek whose father, an ordinary soldier in the Wehrmacht, was wounded in the momentous Battle of Stalingrad.

A "strong and important" minority belonged to the Nazi party, and most Austrians took advantage of the Aryanization decrees which stripped Jews of their wealth and property, according to Anton Pelinka, director of the Institute of Conflict Research.

In all fairness, however, the majority of Austrians just tried to get by, he says. And, writes Fritz Molden in Fires in the Night, approximately 125,000 Austrians fought inside or outside Austria against the Nazi regime.

* * *

In the past three years, Austria, moved by the example of Chancellor Franz Vranitzky, has challenged the dogma that Austria was merely a hapless victim of German imperialism. He has done so in a series of bold, calculated steps.

In July 1991, Vranitzky, a Socialist, issued a long-awaited formal apology for Austria's role under Nazism.

As he put it: "We must not forget that there were not a few Austrians who in the name of this regime brought great suffering to others, who took part in the persecutions and crimes. We own up to all facts of our history and to the deeds of all parts of our people. As we take credit for the good, we must apologize for the evil."

Analysts believe that Vranitzky's myth-shattering statement was largely prompted by the fallout from the Waldheim affair.

Waldheim, the former secretary-general of the United Nations, was elected president of Austria in 1986, and served until 1992. On the eve of his victory, Profil magazine in Vienna and the World Jewish Congress in New York City accused Waldheim of moral negligence for having concealed his wartime record in the Balkans as an officer in the Wehrmacht.

In the ensuing uproar, Austria's image abroad was gravely damaged, if not compromised. Yet in the process, Austria's complicity in Nazi crimes was inadvertently highlighted.

Vranitzky's apology was also triggered by an incendiary remark delivered by the leader of the right-wing Freedom party, Jorg Haider, who praised the Nazis' labor policy.

In June 1993, Vranitzky went beyond his 1991 apology during a state visit to Israel, the first by an Austrian leader.

"We have always felt, and still feel, that the connotation of 'collective guilt' does not apply to Austria," he declared. "But we do acknowledge collective responsibility... We share moral responsibility because many Austrians welcomed the Anschluss, supported the Nazi regime and helped it to function."

While in Israel, Vranitzky promised to improve and broaden assistance to Austrian victims of the Holocaust. (In 1990, Austria concluded an agreement with the Conference on Jewish Material Claims Against Germany for almost $200 million (US) in reparation payments).

What is more, he announced that former Austrians could regain their old citizenship and thus be eligible for social welfare benefits.

Last but not least, Vranitzky disclosed that a chair in Austrian Studies, named in honor of a distinguished Austrian Roman Catholic cardinal, would be established at the Hebrew University.

Later that year, the Jewish Museum in Vienna, which had been closed by the Nazis, was reopened with the financial aid of the Austrian government.

More recently, Austria became the 10th nation to pledge funds for the preservation of Auschwitz and Birkenau, a project launched by the Ronald S. Lauder Foundation. In a ceremony in New York, Vranitzky explained that this was an "extremely important" task in light of efforts by propagandists to deny the Holocaust.

Vranitzky's 1993 statement in Israel generally went down well in Austria.

Paul Grosz, president of the Israelitischen Kultusgemeinde, the chief body of Austrian Jewry, found it "appropriate" and sufficiently far-reaching. "We had talks, but there was no pressure (exerted) on Vranitzky. He is sympathetic to the Jewish community."

Helmut Zilk, the mayor of Vienna, told The Canadian Jewish News that Vranitzky spoke on behalf of most Austrians, though it "would be a lie to claim that he represented all Austrians."

Ernst Gehmacher, a member of the Institute of Empirical and Social Research, elaborates. His statistics indicate that upwards of 15 per cent of Austrians disagree with Vranitzky's show of penance, and feel that Austria "lost" the war. Nevertheless, there is a growing open-mindedness of, and receptivity to, knowledge which clarifies Austria's place in the Third Reich.

Mitten — author of a 1992 book entitled The Politics of Anti-Semitic Prejudice: The Waldheim Phenomenon in Austria — believes there was "a great deal of acceptance" by Austrians of Vranitzky's message. But politically speaking, he went as far as he could without alienating his fellow citizens.

Manoschek concurs. "It was like a line drawn in the sand — the virtual end of official efforts to wrestle with the past. Still, Vranitzky was sincere. He meant what he said. He is not an opportunist."

In general, Austria's intellectual elite applauded Vranitzky, Pelinka says. But he adds this caveat: "I'm less optimistic about the overall population."

Manoschek tends to agree. "Most Austrians believe that while some Austrians — notably Adolf Eichmann and Ernst Kaltenbrunner — were Nazis, they wern't really representative of Austria."

Referring to the Nazi era, he says that Austrians are interested in the future, not the past. "There has been no real self-examination, as in Germany." And he regrets that the ministry of culture has stopped funding scholars studying the 1938-45 period. "In my opinion, this is a scandal."

Austrian schools, though, now present the Holocaust realistically.

"When I was a high school student in the late 1950s, I got plenty of information on Roman emperors and the Thirty Years' War," recalls Pelinka. "But nothing on the Nazi times."

The spiritual journey that Austria has finally taken to acknowledge its Nazi legacy is best reflected in a story that once made the rounds here.

In the old days, Austrians were certain that Hitler was really a German and that Beethoven — a German — was actually an Austrian. It was a "truth" to which they clung tenaciously.

But today, no serious Austrian would ever present this as a fact. It seems as if the majority of Austrians have come to terms with their troubling past.

New guidelines will affect dependent children

By PAMILA AHLFELD

Canada is a country that has always prided itself on fairness and consideration of humane values, particularly within the immigration programs. The Canadian government has made programs available to various groups of immigrants and in particular has stressed and promoted family reunification.

In 1992, Canadian Immigration rules changed with regard to dependent children. Prior to 1992, all unmarried single children could be included in their parents' applications for permanent residence regardless of their age.

Now new rigorous guidelines have been imposed on dependent children over the age of 19. These guidelines will cause irreparable harm to potential Israeli immigration applicants.

The definition for a dependent daughter or son is that they must be less than 19 years of age and unmarried. The exceptions are for children 19 years of age or over who are unmarried and have continuously been enrolled and in attendance in a full-time academic program and who are wholly or substantially supported by their parents. (The second part of the definition relating to mental or physical disability is irrelevant to this article.)

The definition appears to be clear enough; however, from the time these new guidelines were introduced, many practitioners have seen one major flaw which discriminates against dependents from certain countries.

These guidelines have not taken into consideration mandatory military service in various countries worldwide. The Canadian government is taking the position that a person performing more than one year army service is no longer a dependent. In most countries where military service is mandatory, the conscription age is 18.

There are, of course, some exceptions but this seems to be the general consensus. Throughout their service, soldiers are paid meagre wages and while they do receive some training, it is not necessarily training in the career of their choice. Only on being released from the service can they aspire to attain the career training of their choice. They have not become independent, as they are still within the framework of an organization which dictates what they can and cannot do.

In most cases, these children will return home to their parents and resume their education in colleges and universities. Why then are they not treated as dependents?

The policy smacks of discrimination. If military service is an option and one chooses to enlist then one is making a career choice. You could then argue that this person has become independent. If, however, you take a scenario where two 20-year-old males are applying to immigrate with their parents, one from England attending university full time and one from Israel, then the one from Israel who is in the middle of his army service will be disqualified.

Is it fair to expect people to try to circumvent the system and become draft dodgers from their country of origin? I believe we should seek those immigrants who fulfil their obligations and display commitment and dedication. These are the people who will contribute to the Canadian economy and culture.

The feedback from the visa offices has been positive. I have been told that they would like to help but that "their hands are tied." There is a directive from national headquarters which clearly outlines how these cases are to be handled. I recently expressed these concerns to Laura Chapman, director general, Policy and Program Development, and needless to say, her answer was disappointing.

In her reply to me, dated June 28, she stated: "The issue of dependency of those performing mandatory military service was carefully considered before the current dependency regulations were introduced in 1992. As Canada receives immigrants from many cultures, it would be impossible to arrive at a definition that would satisfy all cultural norms or cover all situations. A person performing military service is normally no longer considered dependent on his or her parents."

In other words, unless there are extenuating circumstances, a person performing military service is to be considered an independent.

If Canadians want to attract quality immigrants to this country, we must project the image of being fair and compassionate. Canada cannot and must not treat people from different parts of the world differently. Canada must be prepared to develop immigration policies which will treat all applicants equally. The dependency guidelines must be revised to maintain Canada's equal standards in immigration.

An encouraging trend

One of the most welcome by-products of Israel's rapprochement with the PLO is the warming of bilateral relations with Egypt, the first Arab country to have signed a peace treaty with Israel.

Since the Rabin-Arafat handshake in Washington a year ago, the so-called cold peace that has unfortunately characterized Israel's relationship with Egypt has begun to thaw.

That Egypt is reassessing its correct but cool policy toward Israel is clear. The Egyptian president, Hosni Mubarak, gave voice to this trend in August when he expressed a desire to upgrade ties with Israel. Several weeks later, he dispatched the foreign minister, Amr Moussa, to Jerusalem. It marked the first official visit of a high-ranking Egyptian official to Israel in several years.

Moussa's presence in Jerusalem was one of the first in a series of developments since 1993 which illustrate Egypt's seriousness in enhancing relations with its former adversary:

•Egypt has suspended the special "yellow pass" would-be Egyptian tourists to Israel had to obtain. It is now far easier for an Egyptian civilian to visit Israel.

•Egyptian newspapers appear to have abandoned the practice of not sending correspondents to Israel. This holds out the promise that Egyptians will be better informed about Israeli society.

•Israel and Egypt have inaugurated a direct fibre optic cable link, and a consortium of Israeli and Egyptian businessmen have decided to build a refinery in the Alexandria Free Trade Zone. Furthermore, there is talk of building a new gas pipeline linking the two countries.

Much more remains to be done. Mubarak, for example, has never set foot in Israel, despite numerous visits by senior Israeli officials to Cairo. Thus, Israel's president, Ezer Weizman, was right to say that he would fix a date to visit Egypt only after Mubarak ends his personal boycott of Israel.

Egypt has played a constructive role in the Middle East peace process, but it can do far more to widen the circle of peace if it continues to improve relations with Israel.

Dramatic changes

After 45 years of relatively small economic growth in the Middle East — primarily as a result of the Arab-Israeli conflict — dramatic changes are beginning to take place.

The changes have been caused by the rapid move towards peace between Israel and several of her Arab antagonists, notably the PLO and Jordan. The rapidity of these moves has been startling but they have not inhibited speculation over the economic and trade benefits predicted to accrue from them.

This is the exercise indulged in by Brian Scudder, writing in the Middle East (September 1994), a British-based monthly which has traditionally been pro-Arab in its orientation. The author feels that the economic shape of the Middle East is about to be transformed both by the current treaties and by a prospective deal with Syria that is in the works.

Although he has a number of reservations, Scudder suggests a Middle East free trade area is a realistic scenario. This arrangement will involve Egypt, Syria, Jordan, Lebanon and the PLO in a common infrastructure "linking electricity grids, transport networks, telecommunications and water."

Israel's Foreign Minister Shimon Peres has been especially sanguine in predicting that full peace will result in a combination of "Saudi oil plus Turkish water plus Egyptian labor plus Israeli know-how." Others in Israel feel that a relaxation of political and military tensions will encourage multinationals to relocate in Israel, a country with a plentiful supply of high tech industries and a skilled work force.

While most of these optimistic plans are still in the speculation stage, there are some concrete moves afoot to improve immediately the business climate between Israel and her neighbors. The removal of the Aqaba-Eilat border fence and the fact that British newspapers are already advertising joint Israeli-Jordanian tours bode well for an increase in the tourism sector.

Plans are also underway, says Scudder, for the "reconstruction of the coastal highway along the whole eastern littoral of the Mediterranean." Cooperation between Israel and Jordan on east-west roadworks and water allocations from the Yarmuk River are also proceeding smoothly.

A Middle East economic utopia is still a distant dream while Syria remains recalcitrant and the Arab League boycott remains in force against Israel. Yet the initial steps towards regional cooperation, despite the obstructions, appear promising. Even if one-tenth of the projected scenarios come to fruition, it will represent a giant stride for Israel and the Middle East.

Letters to the Editor

Letters are welcome if they are brief, in English or French, typewritten with lines double spaced, and of interest to our reading public. CLOSE JCC ON SHABBAT

As a regular user of the JCC, I was most saddened to hear of the financial plight the institution finds itself in. I agonize over the loss of jobs to good people whom I have come to admire over the years for their devotion and dedication to the JCC.

I beseech every Jewish family who belongs to another facility to search their heart and ask themselves what our community would be like if the JCC were to fold. It is the one place where all Jews can come together as one people without labels and without an agenda. I urge every Jewish person to become part of the solution by joining the JCC and helping it now in its hour of need.

To the JCC executive committee and board members, I humbly offer the following for deliberation: El Al Airlines, from its inception, operated in debt and was subsidized by the government of Israel. In 1974, El Al made the decision to stop flying on Shabbat and Yom Tov, and since then, it has been earning a substantial profit. I am not a prophet, so I don't know if there is any correlation. Nevertheless, for the sake of Jewish pride and dignity, the JCC should be closed on Shabbat. Surely, if it is going to "downsize" and cut expenses, consideration must be given to this proposition, which will understandably enhance the character and majesty of the JCC in Toronto.

To the Federation who has taken charge of the JCC, I make the following observation. A study was commissioned recently by the Jewish Federation to advance the cause of Jewish continuity. It is now this same Federation, in its efforts to cut the JCC budget, which also eliminated the JCC Jewish education programming whose very existence perpetuates Jewish continuity. Is it any wonder that most people, especially the younger generation, are somewhat cynical and outright derisive of the "Jewish establishment."

COME BACK TO JCC

As a Jew living in Toronto, it is very disturbing to me to see the negative reports of the financial difficulties of the JCC. This past week was particularly bad since the bank has chosen to exercise a bankruptcy position with this property.

Now, it is rumored that some Jewish "heavyweights" will be approached to pledge substantial sums in order to save the "Y."

May I suggest that those former members who joined the YMCA, Bally and other health clubs, reconsider their position and "come back to the fold" to Yiddishkeit and support this fine Jewish organization.

WHERE WERE JCC DIRECTORS?

I have been following your stories describing the ever-deepening woes that the Jewish Community Centre is expressing. My first reaction is, of course, sympathy for those who have just lost their jobs. However, my second reaction is surprise at how this situation could have been allowed to arise.

An institution does not get $15 million into debt overnight. I understand that the JCC management could not have foreseen that a recession would hit just as they were planning an expansion program. However, when it was obvious that they would not be able to raise the money they needed, why didn't they put an immediate stop to the construction instead of continuing to incur more debts? It would have been better to be a little embarrassed with a semi-finished building, rather than virtually bankrupt with a completed one. When the JCC Bathurst Street branch was first constructed in the early 1960s, the original plans called for a much larger institution. However, then, as now, not enough funds were raised. However, management made the correct decision to live within their means and go ahead with what they could afford.

I have mentioned my feelings of sympathy and surprise. My third reaction is outrage that the innocent ex-employees are suffering, while those who were supposed to be overseeing the entire operations, the board of directors, get no more than a tut-tut. Where were these directors when management failed to remit taxes to the government? Why did they not ask the hard questions before allowing construction to continue? Where were the JCC's auditors when all this was happening? Was everyone asleep at the switch?

I've focused on the past, but what of the future? What is being done, besides asking the community to pour more money into the JCC, to ensure that it will operate under sound management principles from now on? Will the theatre remain dark for the foreseeable future, or will other groups be allowed to use it (so that at least some revenue can be generated)?

In Toronto, we have seen that Garth Drabinsky and the Mirvishes are able to profitably operate live theatre; could we perhaps tap their expertise?

I would like to see answers to these questions before we throw more good money after bad.

MARCHI OFF BASE

It was disturbing to read federal Immigration Minister Sergio Marchi's recent comparisons between Israel and Iraq. Mr. Marchi had the audacity to suggest that Israelis claiming refugee status in Canada were no different than Iraqis who might be claiming refuge from dictator Saddam Hussein.

Mr. Marchi would have been well advised to do a little research before making such comparisons. If he had, he would have discovered that Israel is the only democracy in the Middle East. He would also have discovered that Israel has an almost 50-year history of opening its arms to those seeking refuge. Suggesing that any experience former Soviet emigres might have had in Israel could compare with the plight of genuinely persecuted Iraqis is preposterous and insulting.

It is commonly assumed that there are no such things as "refugees" from open societies. I would be interested to know whether an emigrant from the U.S. or France or Italy can be granted refugee status in Canada. If he would, you can be sure that country would protest as emphatically as Israel has.

Spotlight on stings and scams

By RABBI W. GUNTHER PLAUT

The High Holy Days were the time when we confessed (or were supposed to confess) our sins and failings during the last year. But not every sin can be laid at our door, and the events of the last few weeks could have given us a chuckle if they weren't so sad.

The sting

First there was the revelation that the Not So Secret Canadian Intelligence Service was embroiled in the Grant Bristow affair. This man, alleged to have been a spy for the government, is said to have in fact helped to found the Heritage Front, the new umbrella group of neo-Nazi in Canada.

This escapade was financed by taxpayers' money, as if we didn't have enough problems on our hands already. Of course, so the excuse goes, this was done in order to give us inside information on the right wing extremists. But, as one commentator properly pointed out, the government would not think of robbing a bank in order to expose some of the robbers.

The sad part in all of this is of course that the Heritage Front has gotten a million dollars' worth of free advertisement. People who had never heard about it now ask, "Who are these people really?" And maybe some of them will be inclined to take a more active interest in it and hope it will upset the public apple cart and, at the same time, bash the Jews.

Rabbi Plaut

The scam

More serious, however, is the lamentable way in which some members of the Immigration and Refugee Board (IRB) have abused the process themselves and have declared a fair number of applicants from Israel to be refugees, deserving of the permanent hospitality of Canada.

What has been well known to people on the inside has not been generally made a part of public understanding: 70 per cent of the people who have wheedled their way into Canada have been approved in Quebec, while elsewhere in the country the IRB has turned away these "refugees" at a 90 per cent rate. I will let my readers draw their own conclusions: Why indeed did this happen in Quebec, and practically speaking, nowhere else in the country?

As told in the Jerusalem Report (Sept. 8), in Israel itself the news is getting around that if you can tell Canadian officials the right story you may become a resident of the Great White North. "Consultants" have it all worked out: When you arrive at the airport you tell the officials that you intend to apply for refugee status. You are then taken to an immigration officer and advise them as follows: We are people originally from Russia where we were persecuted; we then went to Israel, but we were persecuted there as well for (so their story goes) there is widespread discrimination against us, especially if we are not Jewish. If we are female we are sexually harassed, because there's a stereotype that all Russian immigrants are in fact prostitutes.

The immigration officials then do what they have to do: they give the applicants a temporary residence permit and the case goes to the IRB who will hear it some weeks down the line.

Meanwhile, the arrivals go to a downtown accommodation which their consultant has arranged. They have paid him already $2,500 (U.S.) and now shell out a further thousand Canadian dollars for a month's stay. Two months later their case is heard.

If they are rejected they are sent back and are now back in Israel, $5,000 poorer.

A lot of Israelis have fallen for such scams, some of them having shelled out $15,000 in borrowed, personal monies, and if their plane takes them anywhere except Montreal the likelihood of their being refused is almost 100 per cent.

Behind it all, so I understand, is an Israeli lawyer who converted to Catholicism, who apparently has made it her life's task to give Israel the worst reputation possible.

Meanwhile, it has been hard to tell people in Israel that this is not Canada's government, but an independent judicial agency which has fallen prey to its own misconceptions or prejudices.

But then, this too will pass, and as we begin the reading of the Torah from the beginning we hope that the temporary cloud that has settled over Canada-Israel relations has disappeared along with the old year.

Jewish world torn by ideological distress

Diaspora Jewry faces anti-Semitism, other problems

By AVI BEKER
The Jerusalem Post

While leaders and scholars in Israel and the Diaspora were redefining the New Jewish Agenda, the bombing in Argentina in July brought back scenes from the Jewish past and some not-so-new notions of Jewish existence and fate.

The challenges of a changing world have created ideological distress and confusion within the Jewish world.

The end of the Cold War brought an end to the struggle for Soviet Jewry, one of the strongest unifying links for Western Jewry. Similarly, the Middle East peace process has drastically diminished, for the time being, the need for public action in support of the State of Israel.

American Jewish leaders thus feel left in the role of gallery watchers at ceremonies on the White House lawn.

The Dialogue with the President, held recently in Jerusalem, left most Diaspora participants thoroughly dissatisfied. President Ezer Weizman didn't agree that he was also president of the Jewish people, and reiterated his position that Jews don't have a real future outside Israel.

Diaspora participants didn't receive the appreciation they had been expecting for their political and philanthropic efforts on Israel's behalf. And while they were seeking a more sophisticated partnership, the Israelis insisted on the monolithic objective of mass aliyah.

The image of a more prosperous Israel and the declining external threat only reinforced existing trends of resentment toward the Diaspora.

The July 18 terrorist bombing of the Jewish community center in Buenos Aires (followed by two bombings in London) demonstrated that recent attempts in Israel among some intellectual circles to develop simplistic theories about a new "post-Zionism" are premature.

Argentinian President Carlos Menem clearly intended his appeal to the Mossad for assistance in investigating the attack to be publicized. He has also requested assistance from the security forces of the United States, Europe and other countries; he wants the international community to share in the responsibility of terrorist actions carried out in the heart of the Argentinian capital.

Menem's words awakened memories of another visit to Argentina the Mossad, in connection with the abduction of Adolf Eichmann. His capture, in 1960, was carried out in disregard of the internationally accepted laws of extradition and constituted a clear violation of Argentinian sovereignty.

During Eichmann's trial in Jerusalem, Robert Servatius, Eichmann's German defence counsel, came up with an interesting argument aimed at undermining the Israeli court's right to try his client.

Israel, he said, had a priori no right to put Eichmann on trial, since the state did not exist at the time the alleged crimes were committed.

The judges' response was that the State of Israel in effect constitutes a link in the long chain of Jewish history, and was the legal heir of the Jewish victims.

The Holocaust, following decades of anti-Semitic persecution, proved the need for a sovereign shelter and homeland for Jews. As such, Israel is responsible for Jewish destiny.

Thus, the prosecution and the judges explained, Israel had the legal authority to deal with Nazi crimes, which had already been defined by international law as crimes against humanity.

Just over three decades after the definition of the legal significance of Israel's responsibility in Jewish history, Israel is now exposed to a totally different dimension of responsibility toward Jewish communities in the Diaspora.

Some "post-Zionism" advocates will find it difficult to digest these instances of anti-Jewish terror connected to the peace process in the Middle East. These attacks underline the common fate of Israeli and Diaspora Jews.

As these "abnormal" aspects of the Jewish existence surface, it is difficult to evolve a clear definition of Israel's role and responsibility to protect civilians who are loyal citizens of other sovereign states.

Traditional Zionist doctrine can no longer supply a clear-cut and significant answer to Jew-hatred in all its different expressions.

In contrast to Herzl's vision, the existence of an independent Israeli state has not eradicated anti-Semitism around the world. Quite often, in both war and peace, Israel's existence only worsens the phenomenon of Jew-hatred.

The international terrorist connections of Islamic fundamentalism or neo-Nazi elements means that the State of Israel must bear the responsibility for Jewish groups around the world.

Thus Diaspora Jewry will be facing domestic problems such as assimilation and weakened Jewish identity, while, at the same time, confronting anti-Semitic terror tied to Israel — its other source of identity.

The Zionist message, that Israel is the homeland of all the Jews, acquires extra clout when terror strikes, even if it does not supply a realistic answer to the more complex needs of Jewish existence in the Diaspora.

Plastic history: How we build our Sukkah

By ERICA MEYER RAUZIN

Last year, my Dad looked around our sukkah, noted its white vinyl pipe structural supports and metal screen walls, and grinned, "I bet this sukkah is just like the one Moses built."

Okay, so Moses didn't have PVC pipes, or prefab wooden lattice, or screens, or an electric fan, or crepe paper grape vines, or a big camping lamp mounted on a hat rack, but it's the thought that counts, right?

We are trying, at least, to dwell in booths . . . that is, to eat there. I am not yet up to sleeping in my driveway, so we don't literally dwell in the sukkah for several reasons.

You will understand that I intend no slur on my husband's construction abilities when I mention that I'm not sure the sukkah is up to the strain of becoming our primacy residence. The screening and lattice might not take the punishment, and the walls are, after all, transparent. The sukkah is in the driveway not because we welcome the stares of passers-by who must wonder what in the world we are doing, but because the driveway is the only dry, level ground we own. The back yard, which has too many trees and not enough space, is also bumpy, buggy, and damp.

Erica Meyer Rauzin

The entire sukkah is only 12 by six feet, not quite enough space for a family of five plus two dogs. Maybe we could make do with it if, like the biblical ancestors we are trying to honor, we were crossing the desert on foot, but we are only crossing the front yard. And, in terms of setting up housekeeping, it is barely big enough for a folding table.

My spouse is actually quite handy with tools, but Sukkot seems to bring out the carpenter in even the least handy handyman. People who usually hire outside laborers to change their light bulbs can be found climbing ladders and hammering boards in preparation for Sukkot.

In fact, we have neighbors who stand up from breaking their Yom Kippur fast and proceed immediately to the garage to start constructing their sukkahs. We have them, but we don't like them, at least not until we catch up.

We never seem to be ready on time. Make that I never seem to be ready. My husband gets the structure built, number coded PVC pipes, rolled up screen, palm fronds (actually a pretty easy commodity in Miami, not to gloat or anything) and all, but I don't seem to get around to the fine points of decor until the last minute.

High up in my laundry room is a packing box marked "sukkah decorations." It is jammed with artificial fruit, construction paper chains, holiday signs and various leftover elementary school arts and crafts projects. Each year's new contributions from the kids get centre stage in decorating, and we fill in around them with the contents of the sukkah box. Age, rain and sun do not improve their condition, so every year we add a few new things.

Over time we have added comfort as well as beauty to our sukkah, having finally secured enough heavy-duty, weatherproof extension cords to allow us to have both a fan and a light, after years of having to settle for one or the other. We have also added padded folding chairs and a longer table, waterproof table covers, and a serving table on the side. This isn't the equivalent of al fresco dining on some classy hotel's scenic balcony, but we're working on it.

As I watch my husband build the sukkah (I call it helping, but he calls it watching), I try to express only admiration. I try to stay in the spirit of the holiday. I try not to sound like people who say, "If we can put a man on the moon, why can't we invent a thermos bottle that really works." That means I don't stand there asking, "Gee, honey, if you can build this nifty little house, why can't you hang all the paintings? Or fix that rickety bookshelf? Or replace the air vent in the living room?" I think it, but I don't say it, or else I'd find myself out on the street . . . without even screen and branches to shelter me from the elements. I'm all for replicating the Exodus, but I'm not willing to give up my PVC. After all, one should have some sense of tradition.

New Synagogue set to reopen

The New Synagogue in Berlin, once the largest shul in Germany, is being rebuilt. Sheldon Kirshner takes a closer look.

By SHELDON KIRSHNER

To the pungent odor of glue, tar, fresh paint and wood, workers are completing the renovation of the New Synagogue on Oranienburger Strasse.

The restoration of this once-grand, Moorish-style synagogue is expected to be finished next May, in time for the 50th anniversary of the end of World War II.

But, for all intents and purposes, the work is already done, said Hermann Simon, the director of the foundation — Stiftung Neue Synagoge Centrum Judaica — which is supervising reconstruction.

In actual fact, only one-third of the synagogue will be rebuilt. Slightly damaged during Kristallnacht, and all but destroyed by an Allied air raid in 1943, it was an abandoned, forlorn ruin in the postwar period.

Due to the danger of collapse, the central portion was torn down by the Communist authorities in August 1958.

This section is not being rebuilt because of the prohibitive cost and because the original plans were lost, explained Simon, a 14th-generation Berliner and former museum curator.

However, a slice of an old, battered wall will be preserved and encased in glass to remind visitors of the trials and tribulations to which German Jewry was subjected following the rise to power of the Nazis.

Built to accommodate some 3,000 worshipers, the red-brick New Synagogue was consecrated in September 1866, when Berlin had an estimated Jewish population of 28,000. Designed by Eduard Knoblauch, it was an impressive edifice, 28 metres high, 44 metres long and 39 metres wide. Its great central golden dome, flanked by two smaller domes with minaret-like towers, was somewhat reminiscent of a mosque.

Centrally located, the New Synagogue stood in the Mitte, the heart of a thriving, growing city, near the College of the Science of Judaism and almost within earshot of the Scheunenviertel, where the residents were mainly East European Jewish immigrants.

On the night of Nov. 9, 1938, Nazi thugs set fire to the shul's wedding hall. The blaze was extinguished thanks to Wilhelm Krutzfeld, the district police chief. By Passover 1939, the synagogue was in use again. But in 1940, the Wehrmacht commandeered it, converting it into a warehouse.

The ruins of the New Synagogue on the eve of reconstruction.

The building was hit by Allied bombers on Nov. 22, 1943. A police report of the day described it as a "total loss."

The synagogue remained empty after the war, a ragged, weed-infested structure on the periphery of the capital of East Germany. In 1961, the local Jewish community approached the government and suggested that it be turned into a Jewish museum.

No action was taken.

Ten years later, Dr. Peter Kirchner, head of the East Berlin community, tried again. Not until 1988, the 50th anniversary of Kristallnacht, did his proposal meet with success.

The reason was clear. In an attempt to revive its lagging economy, East Germany sought to increase trade with the West, particularly the United States, by appeasing the Diaspora.

"The country was practically bankrupt at this point," said Simon, who was Kirchner's deputy.

The domes of the New Synagogue in Berlin.

So, at a time of severe fiscal restraint, East Germany poured a small fortune into the renovation project. Work began six years ago with the laying of a cornerstone. Erich Honecker, the East German leader, took part in the ceremony.

With German unification in 1990, Bonn assumed overall responsibility for reconstruction. However, the municipality of Berlin agreed to pay the salaries of Simon and his staff.

According to Simon, the final cost is expected to be DM 70 million, or about $42 million (US), a portion of which will be borne by private contributors.

When they finally got down to renovating the synagogue, several challenges faced the building contractors — who, Simon declared, "put their hearts into it."

First, the ruins had to be secured to facilitate a proper inspection of the premises. Walls were wet and iron columns were shaky. "The synagogue was more or less a pile of rubble, and as overgrown as a jungle."

Second, workers had to laboriously remove a heavy concrete floor which the Nazis had installed.

Third, there was a shortage of high-quality materials, ranging from copper wiring to water pipes, and contractors had to scramble.

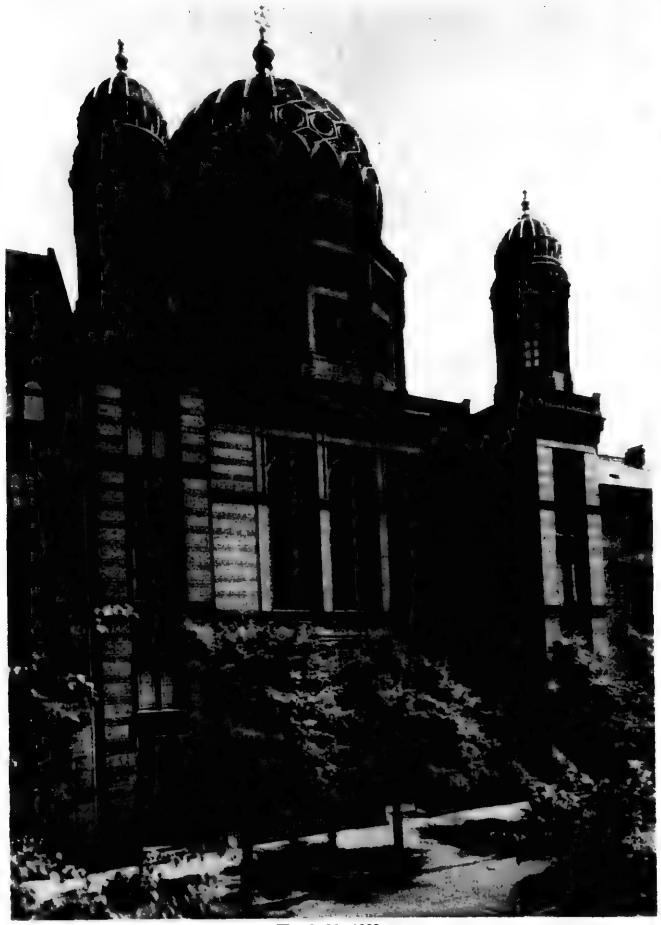
Fourth, new building regulations came into force after unification, making life still more complicated for everyone.

Good craftsmen and specialists like mouldmakers and metalworkers were not hard to find. But Simon realizes that he was lucky. "Everything had to fit just like a puzzle."

When the last nail is driven in and the final wall is primed and painted, the synagogue will function as a "living museum," in Simon's words.

It will be a documentary centre-cum-archives on Berlin Jewry, as well as a meeting ground for Jews and Germans. "It will not be a dead, dusty place," said Simon.

"We're not doing this for ourselves," he added. "We're doing it in memory of those who are no longer here. And we're doing it for our children's generation."



The shul in 1932.

I have more than a passing acquaintance with Lodz. It is not just another anonymous city in Eastern Europe. It is where my parents, David and Genia, were born and raised. And it is where they endured unspeakable degradation and suffering.

Lodz, in the geographic centre of Poland, was one-third Jewish before World War II. When the Wehrmacht invaded on Sept. 1, 1939, my father was a soldier in the Polish army. He was wounded on the battlefield, and recuperated in a hospital behind German lines. My mother, who had recently given birth to a boy, waited for him to return.

When he was finally repatriated some months later, Lodz had a new name — Litzmannstadt — and the surrounding region had been annexed by Germany. More important, the Germans had herded the Jews into a corner of Lodz and had converted it into a crowded, squalid ghetto.

Lodz was the last ghetto in Nazi-occupied Poland to be liquidated. The remaining Jews there were rounded up and shipped to Auschwitz in August 1944. My parents were on one of those dreaded transports.

These thoughts coursed through my mind as I watched Lodz Ghetto, the finest documentary I have yet seen on the subject. The film, which was broadcast on PBS two years ago, is now available on cassette through Atlas Video in Bethesda, Maryland.

It is graphic and poetically moving, a seamless compilation of film footage, black and white and color photographs and poignant voiceovers from diaries and monographs.

The Lodz ghetto

It begins as German troops, accompanied by a procession of trucks, tanks and bicycles, arrive as conquerors on Sept. 8. Ethnic German residents-cum-fifth columnists greet them rapturously with raised stiff arms and shouts of heil Hitler. The Jews are doomed. A German official contemptuously refers to the Jewish population as "this pestilent abscess."

As might be expected, Lodz Ghetto is a litany of horrors. Children cry and whine, complaining of hunger, and adults are beaten back mercilessly as they attack food wagons. And in a foretaste of things to come, the Germans clear out apartment buildings, killing 100 of the inhabitants in a March 1940 pogrom.

Chaim Rumkowski, the Jewish elder of the ghetto, assures everyone that if they keep the factories running for the Germans they will survive. In an intriguing curbside meeting with SS chieftain Heinrich Himmler, who's settled snugly in a convertible, Rumkowski humbly spells out his guiding philosophy — "work, peace and order."

Rumkowski, a benign autocrat, keeps his end of the bargain. The Jews produce uniforms and spare parts for the Wehrmacht. But the Germans keep tightening the screws.

The ghetto is a miasma of muck, stinking garbage, shabby stores and vacant-eyed children, where destitution and starvation reign supreme. In October 1941, hapless Jews from Prague are crammed into the ghetto, dressed as if they were on vacation. Not long afterward, German Jews join the pathetic assemblage.

When the Germans order the evacuation of 10,000 people, a wave of terror inundates Lodz. Who will it be? Rumkowski gives his "word of honor" that nothing "bad" will happen to "people of good will." But, of course, he is misinformed. The evacuees are dispatched directly to Auschwitz. The Jews who've been spared face the prospect of famishment as food shipments, which had been paltry, are curtailed. Now no one is safe anymore. "I despise this life," wails a woman.

More tragedies lie on the horizon, following a bizarre Beethoven concert. Mothers weep as their children are taken away for "parts unknown." The Germans raid the hospital, throwing children out of windows. The ghetto writhes in convulsions. "There is no justice in the world," a man muses. "Even less here."

In May 1944, 80,000 Jews still languish in the ghetto, hoping against all hope for salvation. The final deportations begin. Rumkowski is politely escorted into a cattle car on a one-way journey. When Lodz is liberated by the Soviet army, 800 Jewish survivors remain.

A chapter in Jewish history is closed.

Jewish high school possible for Hamilton

By MOURA WOLPERT
CJN Correspondent

HAMILTON — An expanded Hebrew language and advanced Jewish studies program now being offered to Jewish high school students may well be the first step towards the establishment of a Jewish community high school here.

Dr. Judah Denburg and Prof. Adele Reinhartz, who together with Larry Katz form the planning committee for Midrasha, as the program has been named, hope that Hamilton will have the school within a couple of years.

At present, the only option open to parents of Hamilton Hebrew Academy (HHA) graduates, or of any other Jewish students wishing to continue their Jewish education through high school, is to send them to Toronto.

The majority of HHA graduates go on to public high school, and although Hamilton now has a yeshivah, only a few of its 80 students are local. And, as Denburg points out, it is only for boys.

Denburg has two sons, the older one just starting Grade 9. The eldest of Reinhartz's four children, a girl, graduates from the HHA next year. Like many others, neither parent wants to "break up the family" by sending the children out of town.

Their dream is a community, non-denominational — and the stress, emphasizes Denburg, is on non-denominational — high school along the lines of CHAT, the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto.

That there is support for the project was seen in the enthusiastic applause which greeted Denburg's proposal at a recent Federation planning and priorities meeting.

In his office at the McMaster University Medical Centre, where he is head of the immunology and allergy department, Denburg explains that the initial courses became possible thanks in part to a Federation subsidy, and to the offer of classrooms by Beth Jacob school.

And across the campus in her office at University Hall, Reinhartz, an associate professor in the department of religion, provides details of the courses.

Parents enthusiastic about project

Three levels of Hebrew, including OAC level, will be offered at Westdale Collegiate under the Hamilton Board of Education's third language program.

The first level, which Reinhartz says will require "a good level of prior Hebrew," is actually the second level of the general high school language study program. Students wishing to attend but who are not Academy graduates, will probably have to take a test. But if there is enough interest, she adds, "we could offer the first level."

A course on Jewish texts requiring an advanced level of Hebrew, and a third course of general Jewish studies without a Hebrew prerequisite and open to all, will be held at Beth Jacob School.

Principal of the Beth Jacob school, Larry Katz, who conducted and taught similar programs in Cincinnati, helped formulate the courses.

He already conducts Beth Jacob's highly acclaimed after-school high school and "in a way," he says, the new courses "will be a natural extension."

HHA Hebrew teacher, Rachel Hauser, helped plan the Hebrew program; the first semester of the Jewish texts course will be taught by Rabbi Irwin Zeplowitz of Temple Anshe Sholom, and the second by Rabbi Israel Silverman of Beth Jacob Congregation. Dr. Louis Greenspan of the McMaster religious studies department is in charge of the third course, which will consist of a variety of topics, with teachers drawn from the "great repository of academics, teachers and scholars of all streams we have here in Hamilton," as Denburg puts it, as well as others from Toronto and elsewhere.

The son of the late eminent Montreal rabbi and scholar, Rabbi Chaim Denburg, Judah Denburg has "a very strong Orthodox background" and is himself an accredited Hebrew teacher.

But "where you belong is less important than what you do," he says as he once again stresses that the new courses and projected high school will be non-denominational and open to all.

Associated principal returns from Israel

By FRANCES KRAFT
CJN Staff Reporter

Jerry Rosenfield

TORONTO — Jerry Rosenfield leans forward in his chair, animatedly discussing his recent year-long sabbatical in Israel.

The sounds of boisterous students playing at recess float in through the open window of his office, which overlooks the playground at Associated Hebrew Schools' Neptune Avenue branch.

Rosenfield, 51, is in his element. The general studies principal of Associated's two-campus junior high division and an admitted perennial student has an association with the school that dates back to his student days at the old Brunswick Avenue location.

"This is my second home," he says.

Throughout the past 24 years as an administrator at Associated, and prior to that as a math and computer science teacher at Bathurst Heights Secondary School, Rosenfield has pursued Judaic and educational studies.

Most recently he immersed himself in a program for senior educators at Bar-Ilan University in Ramat-Gan. He and his wife Bea, a teacher of English as a second language, packed up and rented out their Toronto home and moved with their two teenage daughters to Jerusalem, a 50-minute bus ride from Ramat-Gan. Their two sons had preceded them to Israel.

The only Canadian of the 10 educators at the university's Rabbi Joseph H. Lookstein Center for Jewish Education in the Diaspora, Rosenfield joined colleagues from the United States, France, England and Russia.

The program comprised seven full courses plus weekly seminars on the teaching of Israel and Hebrew and on the problems facing Jewish educators in the Diaspora. There were also visits to pedagogic centres and meetings with army officials, politicians and education officials.

Rosenfield chose to take additional courses, and estimates he spent 50 hours a week in study, of which the Lookstein program made up 30 hours. "It was marvellous," he says.

A highlight for him was studying with renowned Torah scholar Nehama Leibowitz, 89, who conducts small classes in her Jerusalem apartment.

Rosenfield was also fascinated by a course in cantillation (trope) — the musical notations attached to the words of the Torah. The subject formed the focus of his research paper at Lookstein. Trope is "probably one of the most ancient commentaries on the text," he explains.

Rosenfield credits Associated for allowing him to enrol in the Lookstein program. "While my title is general studies principal, Rabbi [and Hebrew studies principal Pinchas] Brumer and I run the school as a team. I am as involved in discussing programs for Yom Ha'Atzmaut and Purim as he is in planning English speaking contests.

"Our philosophy at Associated is that there are general studies, but no secular studies. The whole curriculum is [aimed at] developing the Jewish child into a mature, knowledgeable, thinking, vibrant adult who will ultimately take his place in the Jewish community."

After conferring extensively with colleagues from other countries, Rosenfield has concluded that Jewish education in North America, particularly in Toronto, is "outstanding."

A trace of disbelief is evident when he mentions that one overseas day school of which he knows offers only four hours of Jewish studies a week.

Associated, in contrast, devotes 40 percent of its curriculum to Judaic studies. The secular program, Rosenfield points out, follows Ontario Ministry of Education guidelines and "is viewed as a very fine program."

There is much to be gained by making an investment of time and money into Jewish identity, says Rosenfield. He reflects on his own investment at the Lookstein Center, for which he received a partial stipend from Bar-Ilan University. "Many of the things you pick up are intangibles. Clearly our love of Israel was enriched. It was so refreshing. It opened the door for me to share with colleagues around the world.

"It's vital to recharge your batteries. I would recommend it to all my colleagues."

WEIZMANN MOVES CLOSER TO JAPAN

The increasingly close ties between Weizmann Institute and their Japanese counterparts were reflected recently by a visit to the Weizmann campus of Prof. Leo Esaki, one of the winners of the 1973 Nobel Prize in Physics for his work on semiconductors. Here Esaki, president of the University of Tsukuba (left), is shown with Weizmann Institute Prof. Ephraim Katzir, fourth president of the State of Israel and one of the first two recipients of the prestigious Japan Prize in Biotechnology.

Kosher cooking classes being offered this fall

TORONTO — The Kashruth Council of Toronto, affiliated with Vaad Harabonim of Toronto, Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto and Canadian Jewish Congress, has announced its lineup of fall cooking classes.

Three new classes will be offered this fall, while a successful class from last season will be repeated.

The cooking classes and demonstrations will be given by Vivian Anhang, a teacher and graduate home economist with many years' experience in presenting food-related programs to all segments of the community.

A special seminar on healthy Jewish lifestyles will be presented by dietitian/nutritionist Sharon Gottlieb. Gottlieb is director of nutrition of the Fitness Institute and she has a private practice and extensive experience in counselling.

The classes will once again be held at the Shaarei Tefilah Congregation, on Tuesday evenings at 8 p.m. There is ample parking and convenient public transportation. The fee for each class is $15; $10 for students under 18 years of age.

Seminar on Healthful Jewish Living (V26) on Oct. 11 by Gottlieb will have the format of a discussion and question and answer session. The program will include a review of Canada's Food Guide to Healthy Eating, how to be a "label-maven" and learn supermarket smarts, and how to adapt the healthier guidelines to your own lifestyles. This special session will be of interest to people of all ages.

Quick and Easy Cooking (V27) to be presented on Oct. 18, is a new cooking class and demonstration by Anhang. This class will include a strawberry cottage cheese salad, honey fruit compote, vegetable soup, cabbage surprise, chocolate chip chocolate cake, and more.

Gourmet Cooking and Entertaining (V5) on Oct. 25, will be a repeat class by popular demand. This gourmet meal course will feature sweet and sour fish, superb vegetable soup, stuffed boneless veal roast, pasta salad, potato rice gourmet salad, chocolate roll and cinnamon roll (yeast).

Casserole Galore — Part II (V28) on Nov. 8, is a new session and will include a number of casseroles including a beef and rice casserole, an eggplant meatless casserole, a salmon noodle casserole, bok-choy and mushroom casserole, pudding cake/bread pudding and more casserole information.

Dreamy Desserts (V29) on Nov. 15 will be a demonstration of the world of wonderful desserts for family or entertaining. This session will feature chocolate chip chocolate supreme cake, marble cheesecake, springform lemon cake, turnovers, ice cream bars and other mouth-watering desserts.

The classes, which are open to males and females, are limited in enrolment. Registration is first-come first-serve.

To register, send your name, address, postal code, phone number (home and work) and a postdated cheque for the day of the class to: Cynthia Gasner, Information and Public Relations, Kashruth Council of Toronto, 4600 Bathurst St., Suite 240, Willowdale Ont. M2R 3V2.

If registering for more than one class, please send a separate cheque for each class and for each participant. For more details, call (416) 635-9550.

Peace Now founder to visit

TORONTO — Tzaly Reshef, one of the chief founders of Peace Now, the largest grassroots movement in Israel's history, will speak about the realities and challenges of making the current peace process work at the annual meeting of Canadian Friends of Peace Now on Thursday, Oct. 6 at Temple Sinai at 8:15 p.m.

Reshef, the official spokesperson and a principal organizer for Peace Now since its inception in 1978, serves in the Intelligence Unit of the Israel Defence Forces (Reserves). He will report on the latest development between Israel, the Palestinians, Jordan and Syria, as well as on the role of peace movements in supporting the Israeli government's peace process at a grassroots level.

A prominent attorney who has litigated civil rights cases before the Israeli Supreme Court, Reshef is a graduate of Hebrew University and received his LLM from Harvard Law School.

Reshef is a member of the Central Policy Commission of the Labor party and is actively involved in its Central Committee and Bureau.

Reshef, who lives in Jerusalem with his wife and three children, is considered a likely Labor candidate for the next Knesset elections in 1996.

BGU chapter marks 25 years

By MYRON LOVE
CJN Prairie Correspondent

WINNIPEG — The Winnipeg chapter of the Canadian Associates of Ben-Gurion University celebrated its and the university's 25th anniversary with an evening of music and dessert recently at the Shaarey Zedek Synagogue.

The first public Ben-Gurion event in Winnipeg this year, attracted about 70 people and succeeded in reinforcing numerous longtime memberships and adding a few new members as well.

The master of ceremonies for the evening was immediate past president Marshall Freed. (The post of president has been vacant since Freed completed his term at the end of last year.)

Harry Walsh, Q.C., a founding member of the Winnipeg chapter, began the evening by outlining the history of Israel's youngest university and the Winnipeg chapter. Ed Vickar invited everyone to join him and his wife, Marion, in Israel in November for the official opening of the Ed and Marion Vickar Information Centre at the university.

The evening was organized and the deserts prepared by the women's committee, while the music was provided by 16-year-old Russian Jewish pianist Victoria Gomon, accompanied by her father, Naom, who plays the clarinet.

According to Pauline Goldstone, the Ben-Gurion office administrator in Winnipeg, the reception was very successful.

Non-profit housing gets a boost

Beth Emeth, Solel get the nod

By FRANCES KRAFT
CJN Staff Reporter

From left: Irving Pisarek, vice-president, Sviva; Rabbi Joseph Kelman; Avrom Gossack and Brian Antman, both of Sviva, are all smiles on receiving government funding approval for a non-profit housing project.

TORONTO — Two non-profit housing projects initiated by local synagogues were among the 35 proposals approved recently by the Ontario Ministry of Housing under the second wave of its Jobs/Ontario Homes program.

"Non-profit housing is generating thousands of much-needed jobs in construction and other industries," said Bob Rae, premier of Ontario, following the announcement about the proposed projects. "We know that increasing the supply of affordable housing is an essential part of a responsible approach to the housing problems in Ontario."

Seyva (Non-Profit) Apartments Inc., an independent offshoot of Mississauga's Solel Congregation, and Sviva Community NP Housing Inc., which started out as a committee of Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda Synagogue in Downsview, have received approval to build 41 to 60 units and 41 units respectively. Ed Starr of the Starr Group in Concord is development consultant for both projects.

Seyva, which means "elderly" in Hebrew, is awaiting rezoning approval to build a Mississauga seniors' residence. The building would be located on synagogue land directly behind Solel.

The synagogue, located at 2399 Folkway Drive, stands on a pie-shaped lot of approximately 2 3/4 acres, said Ella Stoch, chair of the Seyva board.

The Seyva initiative was inspired by a similar project which Solel's Rabbi Lawrence Englander saw in Winnipeg in the late 1980s.

The increasing number of Solel members whose parents were moving to Mississauga was the raison d'etre behind the project, although the apartment, like all those funded under the government program, will be open to people of all backgrounds, pointed out Rabbi Englander, who is a member of the Seyva board.

Seyva represents Solel's third foray into non-profit housing. The congregation is a partner with Streetsville United Church and South Peel Unitarian Congregation in Pathways, an independent corporation with two non-profit apartment buildings in Mississauga — a 132-unit partially-subsidized building and a 98-unit building scheduled to open early next year. The former project is the recipient of a design award, Rabbi Englander said.

Sviva, which means neighborhood, has plans to construct a building within walking distance of Beth Emeth, said Avrom Gossack, Sviva board member. "The area we're aiming at is Sheppard Avenue between Bathurst [Street] and Wilson Heights [Boulevard]." The synagogue is located at 100 Elder Street, eight blocks north of Sheppard.

The project will consist of a mixed-use building, said Gossack. Tenants will include singles, families, seniors and handicapped people. Approximately 15 per cent of the units will rent for market value, while the rest will be geared to tenants' incomes, a representative of the Starr Group told The CJN.

The idea for the initiative goes back about two years, says Gossack. It was proposed to Gossack, who was then social action chair of the synagogue. Beth Emeth's history of social action includes helping Jews leave the former Soviet Union, Gossack told The CJN.

On a local basis, the shul has a longstanding association with the Reena Foundation, a non-profit agency dedicated to integrating developmentally disabled adults into mainstream society. Rabbi Joseph Kelman, Beth Emeth's longtime spiritual leader, was a co-founder of Reena.

Although Sviva is independent of Beth Emeth, there will be an "ongoing relationship" between the two entities, says Gossack.

CBC radio drama features Jewish themes

By BEN ROSE
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Is your 75-year-old father smart enough to figure out that a bank employee didn't lie down on the floor like everybody else during a robbery because she was the one who had to get rid of a computer virus?

Or that the father's uncanny observation powers would lead to the solving of a downtown Ottawa bank heist of $5,500,000 slated to buy arms for the IRA?

Jewish writer Henry Comor figures his late father was, and that's why Isaac Bloom, a retired Toronto shmata trade manufacturer, is the hero of Albert's Father, a four-part, half-hour CBC drama airing Saturday at 6:30 p.m. on CBL (740 AM).

The final two episodes run Sept. 24 and Oct. 1, the latter being the one in which the elderly Bloom figures out that the computer virus was the signal to start the robbery. The bank employee, a partner in the robbery, was transferring money electronically to Ottawa from Bloom's Toronto account when the virus hit, giving the robbers their signal to enter.

This was only one of the brilliant deductions made by the retired Bloom (Toronto actor Marvin Goldhar), who sprinkles his talk with lots of Yiddishisms, not only those familiar to non-Jewish listeners, but many with a salty, satirical bent, including some juicy curses. True Yiddishists will revel in them.

"Comor gave us a Yiddish glossary," said director and executive producer Bill Howell.

Though some might think the character of Isaac Bloom is passe and stereotypical (How many Jewish garment manufacturers are there today?), this weakness is overcome by Comor's resourceful scripts with their clear understanding of the way computers, banks, police, news reporters and railways work. It's also refreshing that Comor knows that a 75-year-old widower does not lose his interest in sex.

"The relationship between Albert [a CBC-TV broadcaster] and his father is what I imagine I might have had with my own father," said Comor, a medical doctor turned actor, writer and broadcaster, who now lives in Ottawa.

In the Oct. 1 Bank Job, Comor himself has a brilliant cameo part as a Scottish shoemaker who made three-inch lifts for one of the bank robbers who wanted police to believe he was six feet tall.

In the Sept. 24 episode, Bloom rides the train from Toronto to Ottawa and is captivated by a vivacious young woman from Rimouski, Quebec. As she prepares to get off at Kingston, an RCMP officer arrives to question her and asks for her luggage. Because he can't resist a pretty woman, Bloom covers up for her, and says her valise is his own. Naturally it turns out to have $350,000 in profits from smuggled cigarettes. You may not be suprised to know that Bloom solves that crime too.

Toronto actor Marilyn Lightstone is Jill, Albert's boss at the TV station.

Howell said mild coronaries suffered by Comor held up production, but two other episodes of Albert's Father have already been scripted by Comor, and Howell hopes to produce six more in all as part of his Mystery Projects program on CBC radio at a later date. It was his team which did the highly successful Midnight Cab series on radio.

Jewish calendars now offer more than a list of dates

By ROSE KLEINER
Special to The CJN

The purpose of a Jewish calendar is to give the dates of Jewish holidays, candlelighting times throughout the year, and Torah readings for each Shabbat.

A Jewish calendar therefore takes us on an annual journey through our heritage.

But today's Jewish calendars have another dimension. They often come with striking illustrations, and with commentaries which capture the remarkable scope and diversity of Jewish civilization.

For example, the fascination with Hebrew letters and words throughout the ages has resulted in a body of art work that is almost magical in its beauty and content, and illustrated Hebrew manuscripts are a magnificent aspect of Jewish civilization.

Illuminations: A Jewish Calendar from the British Library (Pomegranate) makes selections from these manuscripts accessible to every home or office.

The manuscripts presented in this calendar are among the best in the British Library's collection of Hebraica. They date as far back as the year 1300 and come from Spain (Haggadah, c. 1320), Syria (marriage contract, 1771), Italy (Machzor, 15th century), Portugal (Lisbon Bible, 1482), and Germany (Duke of Sussex Pentateuch, c. 1300).

The Jewish Calendar 5755 (Universe) gives inspirational quotes from the Talmud and other texts for each week of the year. Information about the holidays, a challenging puzzle, and diverse photos of Jewish life and art are another aspect of this calendar.

There is also a 1948 letter from a rabbi to his congregation asking forgiveness on the eve of Yom Kippur; a Ladino synagogue sign in Hebrew from Izmir, Turkey; two poems, Jubilation (On Turning Fifty), and She Sang of Rachmones; and a photograph of children in Turkmenistan, wrapped in a large, 100-year-old family tallit.

The Universe wall calendar, Family Scenes, from the Jewish Museum Collection, lists Jewish holidays through 1999. Family scenes from the work of several artists include Moritz Oppenheim's The Return of the Jewish Volunteer, Raphael Soyer's Dancing Lesson, Marc Chagall's Exodus, Max Weber's Sabbath, and Andy Warhol's Ten Portraits of Jews of the 20th Century — The Marx Brothers.

From Hugh Lauter Levin Asssociates comes a calendar with beautiful illustrations from the collection of the Israel Museum, Jerusalem.

Here one finds silver Torah finials from Rangoon, Burma; a synagogue memorial lamp from Sefrou, Morocco, and a Torah shield from Ankara, Turkey. There is a 19th century charoset dish, shaped like a wheelbarrow; a beautifully embroidered Shabbat tablecloth; and most touching — a commemorative handkerchief from 1870 Metz (Germany), showing Jewish soldiers, who fought in the Franco-Prussian War, at their Yom Kippur prayers.

Holiday dates are given through the year 2000, and Hebrew candlelighting blessings are given in transliteration. Four wallet calendars are included.

New on the market this year is the Executive Jewish Calendar from Kar-Ben Copies. This 16-month Planner has a year-at-a-glance calendar on each page, plus space for taking notes. The one-page directory has space for vital information, including fax numbers.

Kar-Ben's excellent children's calendar, My Very Own Jewish Calendar, is packed with all sorts of data, anecdotes, history, trivia and easy recipes. It makes for a meaningful gift with which to start the new school year. For youngsters and their parents, this calendar brings our heritage to life, showing its vitality and diversity throughout the year.

All calendars listed above are for 16 months and have candle-lighting times for most major Canadian and U.S. cities, including Toronto, Montreal, Detroit, Los Angeles and New York.

Kar-Ben Copies, can be reached toll-free from Canada and the United States at 1-800-4-KARBEN.

CHAT, JVS join forces to help kids plan future

By JACK KOHANE
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — A joint program offered by the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto (CHAT) in conjunction with the Jewish Vocational Service of Metropolitan Toronto (JVS) enables young people to explore career opportunities of the future.

They examine what kinds of jobs will be in demand 10 years from today, keying in on those school subjects most pertinent in achieving their goals.

To allay some of the anxiety young people have about future job prospects, the guidance counsellors at CHAT turned to JVS and asked them to create a mini-course to introduce Grade 11 students to the complex process of career planning.

For many of the 150+ youngsters who have enrolled in the program since its inception two years ago, it has proven an exciting exercise in self-analysis and evaluation, while helping broaden their perspective as to employment options.

A battery of personality profile tests are used to assess, areas of interest, aptitudes, personal strengths and weaknesses. Students are encouraged to research the reference materials available that list thousands of career categories and qualifications necessary for each.

Jane Rendely and Cecile Barington are career counsellors at JVS and coordinators of this project. They are familiar with the apprehensions kids have about the future, fears not always articulated to parents.

According to Barington, teenagers often express frustration that they may not have the same opportunities as their parents. "They perceive school as being much harder and more competitive than the older generation encountered," she says. "They ask what kinds of jobs will be waiting for them after their education is completed. Some are angry that even attending the best schools and getting the best education will not necessarily guarantee them a 'good' job in the end."

Rendely adds that kids these days are more serious and more concerned about employment issues than the previous generation was.

"One reality is that the standard of living of today's young people may well be less than that of their parents," she says. "It's a scary thought, but one that does motivate many to strive even harder to enhance their prospects."

Sara Werb, 17, who is going into Grade 12 at CHAT, agrees. "Many of us see the future as a great unknown and are troubled. Not only by the career choices we may have, but also the sad state of the world — poor economies, wars, poverty. Then there is the added pressure parents put on their kids to become doctors, lawyers, or accountants. I feel fortunate in having supportive parents who want me to be happy in whatever I eventually accomplish."

To ascertain what career options she has, Werb decided to enrol in CHAT's 1994 program. Counsellors worked with her in group sessions and in private consultations, to come up with alternatives. Through research and discussions, she discovered more about herself as a person and the spectrum of career choices open to her.

"Now I can tailor my high school and university courses on an informed basis," she reports happily.

Rendely explains that the program helps students concentrate on their skills, values and personal styles. "These are vital in formulating a clearer idea of one's self and of career directions."

This is also achieved through visualization techniques where students are asked to picture themselves a decade from now. What does their day consist of? Do they have a family, or are they working in an office, in their homes, or in wide open spaces? Do they find satisfaction in what they are doing?

"This year, we will be conducting the program at the offices of JVS on Tycos Drive," says Rendely. "We have found that students gain a heightened sense of intensity when taken out of the traditional classroom setting. The comprehensive library here also provides the latest database on matching people with potential careers."

Ed Segalowitz, executive director of JVS says his agency has a long history of working with schools and the community at large in guiding clients to prepare for future work situations and conditions.

"Our integrated, community-based approach, we feel, optimizes opportunities for those who are prepared to face the realities that confront a rapidly changing work environment," he says.

Career planners remain optimistic about today's young people as well as their future employment outlook. They insist that all indicators point to an expanding job market, spurred by new technologies and fueled by people's creativity and imaginations.

Our kids, they hasten to report, possess all the necessary tools for achieving great success, whatever their chosen fields.

Psychologist's centre helps parents deal with children

By LEILA SPEISMAN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — If there is one talent most of us like to think we have, it is being a good parent.

We think that, even when one kid is sitting on the floor refusing to put on his shoes, a teenager is telling you that you are totally out of tune with reality, and your mother-in-law is explaining how in her day, parents were really parents.

Enter psychologist Dr. Stanley Shapiro, founder and director of the non-profit Parenting Education Centre of Ontario. He deplores the fact that "people are not expected to do other jobs without training, but ... we assume that people will know instinctively what to do when they have children."

The Parenting Education Centre was established to "teach family members to enjoy each other," to give parents and caregivers the opportunity to meet with others who have children of similar ages, and to teach parenting strategies and problem solving."

The intention is to prevent problems, rather than to correct them after they have appeared.

Goldie Litwin is a trained facilitator for the centre. In series of eight two-hour sessions, she and a small group of parents work together so that "the parents feel more confident."

The courses are based on the theories of Rudolph Dreikurs' Children: the challenge, which encourage democratic parenting and a "logical consequences" approach to child rearing.

Children are treated with respect, listened to and expected to return this respect and sense of cooperation to the rest of the family.

If they do not, then, rather than the parent shouting, spanking or losing his or her temper, the child accepts the consequence of his or her unacceptable behaviour.

One simple example might be that if children do not pick up their toys, the toys are calmly removed until they decide that they will pick them up. A child who refuses to wear gloves in the winter gets icy hands.

Because the child sees that his or her opinions are valued (even if they are wrong), self-esteem develops.

Another technique the program recommends is to encourage, rather than to praise.

"Don't say, 'You got a great report card!' Say, 'You must be so proud of your report card.' "

When a child is praised, he feels he constantly has to live up to it, she explained.

"This is not a band-aid," Litwin pointed out. "If this technique is used persistently and consistently, it works."

A parent is not abdicating his right as a parent to set rules, Litwin said. The centre assumes that if rules are explained and children are consulted about the rules, they will be likely to cooperate.

The courses are designed for "the parent who wants to be a better parent," said Litwin, who noted that participants come from all walks of life and all family configurations, from couples to single parents.

"Some people even send their nannies," she said.

Courses deal with such basic topics as sibling rivalry, temper tantrums, meal time problems, dealing with teenagers, and family meetings.

"After three or four sessions," Litwin said, "I remove myself from the discussions. Based on the tools they have been given, the participants begin solving their own problems and finding their own solutions."

Shapiro believes that "children from secure, encouraging families have the healthy self-esteem that keeps them out of trouble and helps them become productive adults." Thus, "people who have been trained in effective parenting skills are the cornerstone of a safer and more productive society."

"Talk about Snoring"

A Dream Come True

The challenge to both physicians and dentists has always been to find a relatively simple answer to the problem. And, in fact, persistent research has proved to be very successful, satisfying these five important needs...

- ... must serve as an alternative to surgery
- ... satisfies the individual needs of patients
- ... provides a choice of dental appliances
- ... researches every aspect of sleep control
- ... if necessary, will control mild sleep apnea

The result? A superbly designed, perfectly fitted, dental aid that effectively reduces or eliminates snoring and, mark this, without surgery. Quite an accomplishment! And one that removes a world of worry in the happiest possible way. Simply! Quickly! Expertly!

What's more, Dr. Little works closely with sleep laboratories and medical doctors to help in diagnosis.

We invite you to share in our triumph... beginning with a phone call for an appointment.

A lot of people snore and if they could be heard in chorus it would, indeed, be a great assault on the ears! To sufferers, however, it is a kind of tyranny from which they can't escape - or couldn't, until now!

Without imposing medical or technical reasons for the condition it is sufficient to say that it must be approached with every seriousness and, of course, with the greatest sympathy and understanding.

SILENT NIGHT

We Treat Snoring Without Surgery!

Our treatment has nothing radical.
NO LASER. NO SURGERY.
So simple! So fast! So advanced!
A dream come true. A real breakthrough.
Devised and fully tested
by dentists and medical doctors.
Phone now for a no-cost consultation.

Single no more...

"I joined the Jewish Singles Registry in June of 1993 after hearing about it from a friend. I liked the idea of choosing my own date by seeing a picture and comprehensive bio beforehand. He was one of four men I chose to meet.

When I reported back to my close friends on my findings, it was a most positive one. A summer wedding is planned... as for my friends, they joined as well. One is in a serious relationship, the other just broke up with someone but appreciates the fact she has the Registry to fall back on."

According to Registry Director Rob Singer, from the Toronto office, new members are dating within 10 days of joining the service. It is the fastest, easiest and most non-threatening way for Jewish singles to meet.

Personalized Service

The Jewish Singles Registry is one of the only services that lets you take a proactive approach to dating, with the assurance that the registry's staff is there to assist you in any way they can.

"There was a couple that I knew, who I thought would be terrific for each other," says Sandy Danovitch, the longtime director of the JSR Montreal office. "I had someone special for this young lady to meet. Although she was apprehensive at first, I convinced her to look at a particular file. They've been married for two years now."

The Jewish Singles Registry network of offices throughout Canada is this country's largest Jewish dating service, with more than 2,000 members. The year and a half old Toronto office has just surpassed the 500 member mark, with that number growing daily. Montreal, in business for eight years, has now over 1,600 members and averages one wedding per month.

Registry founder Dora Korzinstone takes great satisfaction in the hundreds of couples who have met through the service. "While it is very exciting to see people click immediately it's also a special feeling to see someone who has been with the service a number of years meet that special individual," she says. "It shows that persistence does pay off."

If you are looking for someone special and want to take the "blind" out of "blind dating" then get on board before the snow begins to fall. For more information please call the offices in Toronto (416) 398-7068 or Montreal (514) 937-2049.

LET'S E.A.T. AT LE MARCHÉ

E.A.T. at Le Marché is a new restaurant with a French and Italian accent at King and Niagara. President and managing partner Michel (Mitch) Lepine believes that a good restaurant thrives by selling the right combination of food, service and atmosphere--and by constant, hands-on attention to quality in all three aspects.

The atmosphere is that of a bistro, bright and relaxing. Here, you enjoy good food at your own pace, in a congenial ambience. There are French posters on the walls, dating from the turn of the century to the 1940's; you will hear jazz and other popular music from the 1940's, including early Frank Sinatra and the voice of Edith Piaf.

To make sure that each dish will be prepared with care and attention, the size of the menu is limited. The kitchen is open, so that you may see everything being prepared.

Delicious Foccaccia Bread

Sandwiches are made with delicious foccaccia bread, baked in-house and always fresh. The frites (like French fries, but finer-cut and lighter) are served with tangy aioli, an Italian spice-and-garlic sauce. On both lunch and dinner menus, there is a choice of enticing pizzas with fine crusts, Italian style, and toppings such as provolone and goat cheese.

The dinner menu offers such enticements as flame broiled rotisserie chicken with herbs, or spicy Macedonian sausage with herbed mashed potatoes. As to dessert, the deep dish apple and raspberry pie, made with fresh fruit, is highly recommended.
